1835

Book Review of Stories of General Warren

Lucian Minor

Repository Citation
Minor, Lucian, "Book Review of Stories of General Warren" (1835). Faculty Publications. 1321.
https://scholarship.law.wm.edu/facpubs/1321
Stories about General Warren—By a Lady of Boston, 1835, pp. 112, 12mo.

The scenes of those grown up readers,—who may choose to scan at a review of so juvenile a book as this, we, brave, for the sake of bringing it, and its subject, somewhat into notice—pointing out some phonological errors—doing justice to its merit—and, above all, freshening the memories, if not informing the minds, of the less fastidious among our countrymen, as to a few of the incidents preceding and attending the commencement of that great struggle, of which the cherished remembrance conveys so much to preserve in American annals a catholic, American, liberty-loving spirit.

These incidents will be found naturally to imbibe themselves in a brief account of the life of General Warren, drawn chiefly from the volume above mentioned. Those who may incline to despise either so simple a book, or a narrative of (to them) such trite facts, as these of which we shall speak, are probably not aware how shallow and narrow is the knowledge existing through the country, and even in some minds that claim to be considecred as enlightened, with regard to our own history. "Mr. President!—recently, at a public dinner in Virginia, vociferated a young center of the Milestone school—a lawyer, we took him to be—" Mr. President! I give you, sir, the memory of the gallant General Warren, who fell at the battle of LEXINGTON!" But and a few months before, a friend as dear to us as ourselves, and whose age and opportunities should certainly have made him know better, confounded Sir William Berkeley, Governor of Virginia in the times of Charles I and II, with Northorne Berkeley, Lord Botetourt, viceroy of George III, in 1769 and 1770! It would not surprise us, to hear a lawyer or a physician—still less a gentleman at large—talk of the burning of Charleston as simultaneous with the battle of Sullivan's Island, because Charleston was burned while the battle of Bunker Hill was fighting—as "John Bull in America" passes in half an hour from Boston, where the folk make wooden utensals, roast wild game, and bake pumpkin pies, into Charleston, where they go gusht and stabs, drink mint juleps, eat young negroes, and feed old ones upon cotton seed.

The narrative before us is couched in a dialogue, between a mother and her two children; and, being obviously designed for gentlemen and ladies not much higher than manakin's rocking chair, less frequently an infantine simplicity of style, that makes us marvel at our own moral courage, is daring to serve up such a baby's mess. Convinced, however, that children's reading may afford both amusement and instruction to grown people, (witness "Early Lessons," "Frank," "The Parent's Assistant," "Sandford and Merton," and "Evenings at Home," and pluribus alii) licencious, as any rate, that among the palate for which it is our duty to cater, there are some youthful ones to which this dish may be both pleasant and useful; hoping, too, that by having her faults of composition noted, the authoress may be induced to correct, or "others in like cases offending" be moved to shun them, we make the venture. Indeed, not only the book's childishness of style, but many offences far more atrocious in a critic's eyes—sins against grammar, idiom, and good taste—are in great part redeemed by the good sense and justness of its reflections, the interesting tenor of its incidents, and the virtuous glow it is calculated to kindle. The sins are very many. Lay," used for "lay," is wholly unwarranted—scarcely palliated—even by the example of Byron, in the Fourth Canto itself: for he was compelled by dures of rhyme; a coercion, which the most tuneful and the most disjointed are alike powerless to resist. "Mr. Warren, the father of Joseph, while walking round his orchard to see if every thing was in good order, as he was looking over the trees, he perceived, etc. Here is a nominative without any verb. There is a four or five fold vice in the second member of the following sentence, in which, as it stands, the writer may be defied to show a meaning: "It often happens that a mother is left with a family of young children, and is obliged to bring them up without the controlling power of a father's care; it is therefore the duty of every female to educate her own mind, and that of her daughters, as to enable her, if she should be placed in this reasonable situation, to be able to guide aright the minds of these under her care." Enable her to be able! Educate her own mind! and that of her daughters! Are they to be supposed to have but one mind among them, as the Sirens had but one tooth? The use of educate for educa, is a match for the Frenchman's blunderer, who, finding in the Dictionary that to press means to squeeze, politely begged leave to squeeze a lady to sing. "Enable him." Enable whom? Why herself and her daughters: and she should have said so. Never, surely, was prosing, born flat, printed prosing, to so little purpose. Again: "A mother should always possess...a firm principle of action." Does she need but one firm principle of action? If so, it is to be hoped the next edition will say what that one is; for it must be valuable. A common blunder in the fuses of the innocent mind, occurs repeatedly in this book: "How I should have admired to have gone to see her!" "It would have been a pity for us to have followed his example, and thus have learned," etc.—must have ardently desired to have been present—"must have wished very much to have seen," etc. We cannot see the propriety of using the word "admiral," as it is in one of these quotations. "Tell us if he did get in, and how he contrived to do it." We protest against this fashion which our Yankee brethren are introducing, of making to, which is but the sign of the infinities of the infantile mind. This is one of the few cases, in which we are for going the whole. "He began to practice!—"I knew it was not him!—"he whom I told you was the first one!—"to respect, was added admiration and love!—"this tax bore very heavy!—"soldiers which!—"your country has much to hope from you, both in their counsels and in their field." These errors, a very moderate skill in orthography and syntax would have sufficed to avoid. Such a vulgarism as "unadorned," or such provincialisms as "pay me single copper," or "walked back and forth the room," (meaning in and out, or backwards and forwards in the room) would not have occurred, if the author had remembered, that the simplicity which suits children's minds, is altogether different from vulgarity. There is such a thing as neat and grateful simplicity in writing, as well as in dress and manners. "They had contemplated making some attack on the British, or at least to endeavor to destroy their shipping." Contemplated to destroy! We will not further pursue this unwelcome ask; pausing, short of the middle of the book, and having already passed over several faults without animadversion. Let the author be entreated to get the aid of some friend who is master (if she is not mistress) of grammar and taste enough, to reform these and the other errors of her little work, and then give us a new edition, calling in all the copies of the first, that are within her reach.—And now to our tale.

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner.

Further reproduction prohibited without permission.

Joseph Warren was born in 1741, in the village of Roxbury, one or two miles south from Boston, Mass. His father, a rich farmer, inhabited a house, the ruins of which are still visible; and was famous for raising the best fruit in that neighborhood. He was killed by a fall from one of his own apple trees, leaving a widow and four sons, of whom Joseph, the eldest, was 16, and John, the youngest, was 4 years old. This excellent woman appears to have much resembled the mother of Washington, in the skill and care with which she infused generous sentiments and virtuous principles into the bosoms of her children; and she reared almost as richly as Mrs. Washington, the fruits of her labors. Her sons passed through life, all honored and loved, and more than one of them distinguished. Her nature seems to have had more of amiable softness than Mrs. Washington's; who, it must be confessed, blended something of the sternness with the purity and nobleness of a Spartan matron. Mrs. Warren's door was always open for deeds of hospitality and neighborly kindness. It is not easy to imagine a lovelier scene than one paragraph presents, of the evening of a well spent life, still warmed and brightened by the benign spirit, which had been the sun of that life's long day.

"In her old age, when her own children had left her "fireside, it was one of her dearest pleasures to gather "a group of their children, or of the children of others "around her. She did all in her power to promote "their enjoyment, and her benevolent smile was always "ready to encourage them. On Thanksgiving-day," she "depended on having all her children and grand "children with her; and until she was 80 years of age, "she herself made the pies with which the table was laden! "Not satisfied with feeding them to their heart's con"tent while they were with her, she also always had some "nice great pies ready for them to take home with "them."

Joseph's education, till his fourteenth year, was at the public school in Roxbury; one of those common schools, which, from the earliest times of New England, have been planting and nurturing in her soil the seeds and shoots of virtue and freedom. Even in boyhood, his hero was manly, fearless and generous: always taking the part of his weaker school-fellows against a strong oppressor—always the "village Hampden, that with dauntless breast, "The little tyrant of his fields withstood."

At fourteen, he entered Harvard University. His talents, perseverance, gentleness and courage, here gained him great popularity. That he did not acquire or preserve the regard of his fellow students by any base compliances with vices or disorder, the following incident shews.

Some of them had once resolved on some breach of the laws, which, from the sternness of his principles, they knew that young Warren would disapprove, and by his powerful influence probably prevent. They therefore met in an upper room of the college, to arrange their plans secretly; fasting the door against him. He found what they were about; and seeing the window of their room open, crept out, through a scuttle door, upon the roof—crawled to the eaves—and there, seizing a water-spout nearly rotten with age, he swung and slid down by it to the window, and unexpectedly sprang in amongst the conspirators. The spout, at the instant of his quitting it, fell with a crash to the ground, and was shivered to pieces. Only saying, in answer to the exclamations of astonishment that burst from his comrades, "it stayed up just long enough for my purpose," he commenced an expostulation against their intended misdemeanor, and succeeded in diverting them from it.

On leaving college, he studied medicine, and began to practise at the age of 23, just previously to a visit of the small pox to Boston, with those fearful ravages which usually attended its march, before the virtues of vaccination were known. Dr. Warren's judgment, tenderness, and skill, made him pre-eminently successful in treating the disease. And it is said, that his gentle and courteous deportment completely neutralized the usual tendency of such professional success, to enkindle the jealousy of his brethren. His mild features and winning smile, true indexes, for once, to the soul within, gained every heart; his knowledge and talents added respect to love. Thus, by the same qualities which had distinguished him at school and college, did he acquire among his fellow townsans an influence which no other man of his age and day possessed.

When the British Parliament and Crown began, in 1764, that course of unconstitutional legislation, which was destined, after eleven years of woody war, to end in a war of blood, Dr. Warren was among the first to stand forth for the rights of Americans—to assert, and to labor in demonstrating to his countrymen, that the power to tax (claiming, as they did, all the liberties of Englishmen) could not exist in a government of which no representatives of theirs formed a part. Fostered by him, and by others like him, the spirit of resistance to tyranny grew daily more strong. The inhabitants of the whole country, and especially of Boston, began to listen more eagerly to the messages of the American press. Dallam with two royal regiments, reinforced afterwards by additional troops, entered that devoted town, with more than the usual "pomp and circumstance" of military bravery; and there remained in garrison, to repress what the king and ministry were pleased to call "the seditious temper" of the people. Never was attempt at restraint more impotent; any, more suicidal. The curb, foolishly and capriciously or unskillfully pld, served but to infuriate the noble animal it was meant to check and guide: and no wonder that the rider was at length unseated, and stretched in the dust. The New Englanders—we should rather say, the Americans—were too stubborn to be driven, and too shrewd to be circumvented. Every measure of tyranny, they met with an appropriate measure of resistance.
Tea had been brought from India, to be the vehicle of unconstitutional taxation. They threw part of it into the sea; another part they burned from being landed; and the remainder they excluded from use, by mutual pledges to "touch not, taste not" the unclean thing. Judges were sent over to judge them—creatures of the king—the panders of ministerial oppression. The people would not suffer them to mount the court houses—referred all their differences to arbitrators chosen by the parties—and even so far tampered the spirit of litigation and disorder, as to make tribunals of any sort in a great degree needless. Between the British troops and the Boston people, an imminence soon ran high. The soldiers seized every opportunity to exasperate the people: the people assembled in mobs, to revenge themselves on the soldiers. Amidst these tumults, Dr. Warren repeatedly exposed his life to soothe and restrain his countrymen. His eloquent perorations were generally successful. At first, the more violent would endeavor to repel him, and would chant to drown his voice. "While they did this, he would stand calmly and look at them. His intrepidity, his commanding and animated countenance, and above all, their knowledge that he was on their side so far as it was right to be, would soon make them as eager to hear as he was to speak: and finally, they would dispense to their homes with perfect confidence that they could not do better than to leave their ease in such hands." Those who seek to restrain the excesses of contending factions, may always expect rough usage from both sides. Warren incurred the occasional displeasure of his own party; but he did not escape insult and outrage from the British. They often called him rebel, and threatened him with a rebel's doom. One day, on his way to Roxbury, to see his mother, he passed near several British officers, standing in the Neck, which joins the peninsula of Boston to the main land. Not far before him stood a gallows. One of the officers called out, "Go on, Warren, you will soon come to the gallows," and the whole party laughed aloud. Walking directly up to them, he calmly asked, which of them had thus addressed him? Not one was bold enough to avow the insolence, and he left them, el'est-fallen and ashamed.

Distinguished for his eloquence, our young physician was repeatedly called on to address the people, upon the great and soul-stirring topics of the times. For the most interesting of these, was the Massacre of the Fifth of March. Our authors has passed too slightly over this incident. Let us be a little more full.

Insults, recrimination, and outrage, between the soldiers and citizens, were at length, on the 5th of March, 1770, consummated, by the former's firing upon the latter in the streets of Boston, and killing five men—-with circumstances shocking to humanity. After one of the slain (Mr. Gray,) had been shot through the body, and had fallen on the ground, a bayonet was pushed through his skull, and his brains fell out upon the pavement. This was the first bloodshed, consequent on the long fostering irritations of the period. The officer (Capt. Preston) who gave the word "fire!" was one of the soldiers who had so anxiously obeyed it, in the ensuing October tried before a Boston jury: and, defended, in spite of obloquy, popular clamor, and the remonstrances of timid or prudent friends, by John Adams and Josiah Quincy, Jr., were even by that jury, acquitted. It grieves us that we cannot pause here, to bestow a merited tribute on the moral courage of the illustrious counsel who dared defend, on the steady justice of the tribunal that could acquit, and on the virtue and good sense of the multitude who, when the first paroxysm of natural excitement was over, could appraise that defence and approve that acquittal—terrible as it had been the deed—madamizing as had been the antecedent circumstances. But though the killing happened not to be murder, (because the people had been the assassins,) still, the violent destruction of five human lives by a public soldiery in a free and peaceful city, was too impressive an example of what miscarriages may come of standing armies and lawless government, to pass unimproved. It was determined to solemnize each anniversary of that day, by a public oration, and a question to the jury, "Did they act as soldiers, communative of the tragedy, and of those great principles, the diargeard of which had led to its perpetration? Warren delivered two of these orations. His first was on the 5th of March, 1775. It is not contained in the little book now before us, but we have seen it elsewhere; and on reading it, no one need be surprised at its having well urged the people, even at that early day, to forcible measures. Its masterly argumentation is equalled by its burning appeals to the passions. All the four first of these orations had wrought so powerfully upon the public mind, that the British officers declared there should be no more of them: and that whoever undertook to deliver another, should do so at the peril of life. This menace daunted others, but only roused Warren. Not waiting to be baulked, he solicited the task of addressing the people; and prepared himself accordingly for the fifth anniversary of the massacre—1775. Meanwhile, the givings out of the officers, and the rumors among the populace, imported mortal hazard to him if he should persist. He persisted but the more resolutely, Early in the day, the Old South Meeting-House— which, as the scene of these orations, deserves, better than Faneuil Hall, to be termed the cradle of liberty— was crowded to its very porch. Many a devoted friend

Mr. Adams was, at the time, 30 years old; Mr. Quincy only 26. They were both threatened with loss of friends, of popularity, and of all prospect of political preferment. The "Memoir of Quincy," (by his son Josiah, once a prominent federal leader in Congress, now President of Harvard University,) contain a letter from his venerable father, earnestly expostulating upon the step. The young barrister's reply is also given—a triumphant vindication of the motives, and even of the prejudice of his resolution, to undertake the defence. In the success of that defence, in the universal approbation which soon followed it, and in the professional and political advancement of the generous advocates, they found ample rewards for having besetted the storm of popular feeling, in obedience to the call of duty.

The oration of 1771 was delivered by James Lovell; that of 1772 by Joseph Warren; of 1774, by Dr. Benjamin Church; of 1776, by John Hancock; of 1778, by John Warren. These, and eight others of succeeding years, down to 1782, we have in Mr. H. Niles' inestimable collection of "Revolutionary Acts and Speeches.

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner. Further reproduction prohibited without permission.
of Warren’s was there, determined to see him safely through, or to fall in his defence. British officers and soldiers filled the aisles, the pulpit steps, and even the pulpit. Thinking that if he pushed through them to his place, a precoct might be seized for some disturbance, which would take from him and his audience the desirable degree of calmness, he procured a ladder to be placed outside, and by it, climbed through the window into the pulpit, just as all were expecting his entrance at the door. The officers quitted and receded, as his sudden appearance and dauntless air; while he, far from sure that his first word would not be answered by sudden uproar and uncontrollable noise, had lifted up his countenance to the height of his great argument, he had boldly before his fancy’s eye, a nobler personification of wisdom, courage, eloquence and virtue, than Homer has displayed in the form of Ulysses. The content, which, in the orator’s own hand writing, is now in the mind, concentrating its powers for some gigantic effort, and as he passes on from the unuttered humility of his possession of his nephew, Dr. John C. Warren. The opening was brief and simple: but in it we discern that curbed energy, that impassioned moderation—the force contentus, the res viva animas—so characteristic of a great mind, concentrating its powers for some gigantic effort; and as he glides from the unconfuted immensity of his exordium "to the height of his great argument," we have boldly before our fancy’s eye, a nobler personification of wisdom, courage, eloquence and virtue, than Homer has displayed in the form of Ulysses.

"My eyes honored fellow citizens, it is not without the most humiliating conviction of my want of ability, that I now appear before you; but the sense I have, of the obligation I am under to the calls of my country at all times, together with the animating recollection of your indignation, exhibited upon so many occasions, has induced me once more, unceasing as I am, to throw myself upon that candor, which looks with kindness upon the feeblest efforts of an honest mind. You will not now expect the elegance, the learning, the fire, the enwrapping strains of eloquence, which captivated you when a Lovell, a Church, or a Ham.ock spake: but you will permit me, to say, that with a sincerity equal to theirs, I mourn over my bleeding country: with them I weep at her distress, and with them, deeply repent the many injuries she has received from the hands of cruel and unreasonable men." Having laid down as axioms, the natural right of every man to personal freedom and to the control of his property, the orator sketched, with a master’s hand, the history of English America: and, deducing the right of the colonists to the soil from their treaties with the Indians, and not from the grants of King James or King Charles, (whose pretended claims of right they undoubtedly despised—whose patents they probably accepted only "to silence the caulis of their enemies," and who "might with equal justice have made them a grant of the planet Jupiter,") he proved by unanswerable reasoning the rights of America, and painted in deep and living colors the usurpations and injustice of England. He traced the progress of these wrongs: he depicted the haughty peace, the mutual benedictions, and the common esperances of the two countries, marred by successive and heightening aggressions—reaching, at length, that last aggravation short of civil war—the quartering of an insolent, belling soldiery upon the people, to enforce submission to unjust and unconstitutional laws. The danger of standing armies, always, to liberty—the incomparability of martial law with the government of a well regulated city—the certainty of disputes between the soldier and the citizen, especially when they are in each other’s eyes, respectively, a rebel, and an instrument of tyranny—all made it but just to fear the most digerable consequences. "Our fears, we have seen," continued the orator, "were but too well grounded."

"The many injuries offered to the town, I pass over in silence. I cannot now mark out the path which led to that unequivocal scene of horror, the soul remonstrance of which takes full possession of my soul. The aurituatory theatre again opens itself to view. The baleful images of terror crowd around me, and disconsolate ghosts, with hollow groans, appear to admonish the anniversary of the Fryth of March."

"Approach we then the melancholy walk of death. Either let me call the gay companion; here let him drop a farewell tear upon that body, which so late he saw vigorous and warm with social mirth; let him lead the tender mother, to weep over her beloved son: come, widowed mourner, here attest thy grief! beholde thy murdered husband gasping on the ground; and, to complete the pompous show of wreathes, let living in each hand thy infant children to bewail their father’s fate: take heed, ye orphan babes, lest, while your streaming eyes are fixed upon the ghastly corpse, your feet slide on the stonesteped with your father’s brains! Enough! this tragedy need not be heightened by an inflaming in the blood of him last gave it birth. Nature, reluctant, shrinks already from the view; and the chilled blood rolls slowly backward to its fountain. We wildly stand about, and, with amazement, ask, who spread this ruin round us? Has trafficked Fortune, or cruel Spain, sent forth her myrmidons? Has the grim savages rushed again from the distant wilderness? Or does some fiend, fierce from the depth of hell, with all the rancorous malice which the apostate damned can feel, swells your destructive bow, and hurl her deadly arrows at our breast? No, none of these. It is the hand of Britain that inflicts the wound! The arms of George, our rightful king, have been employed to shed that blood, when justice, or the honor of his crown, had called his subjects to the field!"

"But pity, grief, astonishment, with all the softer movements of the soul, must now give way to stronger passions. Say, fellow citizens, what dreadful thought now swells your heaving bosoms? You fly to arms; sharp indignation flashes from each eye—revenge! revenge! the voice from the depth of depths!—death! an indiscriminate massacre! Secure to drench his jaws in human gore—whilst he grins an hideous smile, our destructive bow, and hurl her deadly arrows at our breast!"

"Let us approach the melancholy walk of death."

"Be not deceived: a solemn pause ensues; you spare, upon condition they depart. They go; they quit your city: they no more shall give offence. Thus closes the eventful drama."

"And could it have been conceived that we again should see a British army in our land, sent to enforce obedience, the effects of partisanship and injustice, our liberty? * * * * * * Our streets are again filled with armed men; our harbor is crowded with ships of war; but these cannot intimidate us; our liberty must be preserved: it is far deader than life— we hold

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner. Further reproduction prohibited without permission.
"It even dear as our allegiance. We must defend it against the attacks of friends, as well as enemies; we cannot suffer even Britons to ravish it from us. No longer could we reflect, with generous pride, on the heroic notions of our American forefathers; no longer boast our origin from that fair famed island, whence warrlike sons have so often drawn their well tried swords to save her from the ravages of tyranny—could we, but for a moment, entertain the thought of giving up our liberty. The man who mosonably will not turn a shot, will compound with tyrants' gift; or Heaven; and impiously affronts the God that made him free."

Highly wrought as these passages may appear, they accorded, perfectly, with the minds to which they were addressed. It may be doubted, if any scene of the kind ever possessed more of the moral sublime, than that which our young countryman presented,—during thus, amidst Concord: and then, remaining upon the watch, he saw Colonel Smith and 8 or 900 men embark for Charlestown. Knowing the stores and ammunition at Concord to be their object, he instantly sent messengers over the surrounding country, to give the alarm; and himself rode all night, pressing so near the enemy, as to be more than once in great danger of capture. His messenger to Lexington was Col. Revere; who, on suddenly turning a corner as he passed through Charlestown, found himself close to a party of the British. In a moment, he put his horse at full speed, dashed through them, and before they could well ascertain him to be a foe, was beyond the reach of the balls which they fired after him. It was his summons, that called forth the company of Lexington militia, upon whom, about sunrise on the 18th, was begun that bloody drama, of which the progress was to shake two continents, and the catastrophe to disunite an empire. Warren, sleeping less and in motion throughout the night, hurried to the scene of action; and, when the enemy were retreating from Concord, he was among the foremost in hanging nurse by his byes. The celebrated Josiah Quincy, Jr. was at this time on guard at Charlestown. Generals Warren and Putnam with two select companies of Massachusetts troops, repaired thither for the purpose. Here was a touching scene. The British and American officers, on meeting once more as friends after the recent strife had so rudderously wrenched their long subsisting ties of hospitality and mutual kindness, meted with tenderness, and rushed into each other's arms. The soldiers

Woven (now a brigadier general of the Massachusetts militia) was not unconcerned in that battle. Scouts of his had notified him on the 17th of April, that a detachment of troops was to march that night towards Concord; and then, remaining upon the watch, he saw Colonel Smith and 8 or 900 men embark for Charlestown. Knowing the stores and ammunition at Concord to be their object, he instantly sent messengers over the surrounding country, to give the alarm; and himself rode all night, pressing so near the enemy, as to be more than once in great danger of capture. His messenger to Lexington was Col. Revere; who, on suddenly turning a corner as he passed through Charlestown, found himself close to a party of the British. In a moment, he put his horse at full speed, dashed through them, and before they could well ascertain him to be a foe, was beyond the reach of the balls which they fired after him. It was his summons, that called forth the company of Lexington militia, upon whom, about sunrise on the 18th, was begun that bloody drama, of which the progress was to shake two continents, and the catastrophe to disunite an empire. Warren, sleeping less and in motion throughout the night, hurried to the scene of action; and, when the enemy were retreating from Concord, he was among the foremost in hanging nurse by his byes. The celebrated Josiah Quincy, Jr. was at this time on guard at Charlestown. Generals Warren and Putnam with two select companies of Massachusetts troops, repaired thither for the purpose. Here was a touching scene. The British and American officers, on meeting once more as friends after the recent strife had so rudderously wrenched their long subsisting ties of hospitality and mutual kindness, meted with tenderness, and rushed into each other's arms. The soldiers caught the infection: and mingled tears, and hands cordially shaken, softened for awhile the rugged front of war. Putnam and Warren entertained the British as guests, as sumptuously as the occasion allowed.

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner.

Further reproduction prohibited without permission.

A few days afterwards, Warren was appointed Major General of the Massachusetts forces: but still retained his post as President of the Provincial Congress. He seems to have combined, with rare felicity, the qualities of a civil and a military leader. Cool yet brave, gentle yet decided and firm, he was precisely fitted to teach and enforce order and discipline. Mingling in the ranks, and talking with individual soldiers as with brothers, he gained their love, and infused into them his own ardor and sanguine confidence. He acted with equal talent in civil council. He spent a part of each day in sharing the deliberations of the Congress, which sat now at Watertown, ten miles northwest from Boston. His labors ended there, he would gallop to the camp at Cambridge. When the American commanders deliberated upon the seizure and fortification of Dorchester Heights and Bunker Hill, with a view to strike at the enemy’s rampart, or to anticipate them in a similar movement,—Warren opposed it. Our raw troops, he thought, were not yet ready to cope with the trained veterans of England. Putnam, then commander-in-chief at Cambridge, thought differently. Warren renewed his opposition before the committee of safety and the council of war; but when these bodies successively resolved upon the measure, he promptly gave his whole heart to promote its success; repeating his determination, to be, himself, ever at the post of danger, and enforce order and discipline. Mingling in the ranks, cheering on his comrades, sharing their perils, and plying his musket against the advancing enemy. When the British had twice been driven from the height, with a thousand slain; when the expenditure of powder and ball, leaving the Americans no means of resistance but clubbed guns, against fixed bayonets and fourfold numbers, necessarily made the third onset successful,—Warren was the last to leave his station. The slowest in that slow and reluctant retreat, he struggled for every foot of ground; disdaining to quicken his steps, though bullets whizzed and blood streamed all around him. Major Small, of the British army, recognized him; and eager to save his life, called upon him for God’s sake to stop, and be protected from destruction. Warren turned and looked towards him; but sicken ing at the sight and the thought of his slaughtered countrymen and of the lost battle, again moved slowly off as before. Major Small then ordered his men not to fire at the American General: but it was too late. Just as the order was given, a ball passed through his head; he fell, and expired.

His body lay on the field all the next night. When one who knew his person, told General Howe the next morning that Warren was among the slain, he would not believe it; declaring it impossible that the President of the Congress should have been suffered to expose himself so hazardously. An English surgeon, however, who had also known Warren, identified his corpse; and, to prove the shying of which he was capable, added, that but five days before, he had ventured to come into Boston in a small canoe, to learn the plans of the British; and had urged the surgeon to enter into the American service. General Howe declared, that the death of one such adversary balanced the loss of 500 of his own men. Warren’s body was buried with many others, English and American, near the spot where he fell; whence, sometime afterwards, it was removed to the Tremont burying ground, and finally to the family vault under St. Paul’s Church, in Boston. His brothers, at the first disinterment, knew his remains by an artificial tooth, by a nail wanting on one of his fingers, and by his clothes, in which he was buried just as he fell. His youngest brother, Dr. John Warren, at first sight of the body, faint ed away, and lay for many minutes insensible on the ground. We draw a veil over the grief of his mother, when, after a torturing suspense of three days, the dreadful truth was disclosed to her.

Further reproduction prohibited without permission.

In General Warren's pocket, an English soldier found a prayer book, with the owner's name written in it. The soldier carried it to England, and sold it for a high price to a kind-hearted clergyman, who benevolently transmitted it to a minister in Roxbury, with a request that he would restore it to the general's nearest relation.

It was accordingly given to his youngest brother, whose son, Dr. John C. Warren, still retains it. It was printed in 1559, in a character remarkably distinct, and is strongly and handsomely bound.

If our due space had not already been exceeded, we would include in this sketch several other interesting particulars, connected with its illustrious subject: but we must forbear.

There were ample contemporaneous testimonials to the merits of General Warren. Amongst others, was a vote of the general Congress, that a monument should be erected to his memory, "as an acknowledgment of his virtues and distinguished services;" and that his children should be supported at the public charge. Like the prayers of Homer's heroes, this vote was half dispersed in empty air; the other half took effect, so far as the annual payment of a moderate sum went, towards the maintenance and education of the children. It is not until she has mentioned this fact, that our authoress bethinks her of saying, that General Warren was married to an excellent and amiable woman, who died three years before him; and that he left four orphan children. So important an event in human life might surely have been earlier told, and more regardfully dwelt upon. We would fain have had something said of his domestic life, who filled so large a space in his country's eye; something to exemplify what we hold as an everlasting truth—that a good son and a true patriot is sure to make a true husband and a good father. Situated as she is, our authoress cannot fail, by reasonable diligence of inquiry, to learn many things, worthy of the improved edition which we hope to see, of her interesting and valuable, though so faulty production.

We, as one of the posterity whose gratitude and admiration General Warren so richly earned, can read in his destiny more than a fulfilment of the augury contained in the official account of the Battle of Bunker Hill, drawn up by the Provincial Congress. It speaks of him as "a man, whose memory will be endeared to his countrymen, and to the worthy in every part and age of the world, so long as valour shall be esteemed among mankind." To valour, we would add the lovelier and nobler names of courtesy, generosity, and integrity.