Bull market for predictions

Bull market for predictions

Predictions are very difficult, especially about the future.

Howard Orrin: "Everything has a future, so I mean you'll always be in business."

Indeed, there's a virtual bull market in futures out there— at least 2,000 full-time professional prognosticators and more than 200 research groups diligently searching for everything from deforestation and famine to deforestation and famine.

We're not taking sides or positions, and we're not making forecasts.

The interest in the future has been kept alive by more than 500,000 new men and women (mostly between 18 and 35) who have been recruited into the new movement. And among you, the new generation, is there a more important issue to be decided than the future?

Physicist Niels Bohr peered into the future, as did others. Not all the predictions were right, but the effort was worthwhile.

"Business—indeed, life—is like a chess game. Those who play skillfully look ahead a few moves."
