LILLIE MURPHY — It will take some time to complete the full capital campaign for the new law school building. But the campaign is moving forward, and the goal is to have the building completed in time for the fall semester.

The new building will be a major improvement over the current building, with more classroom space, larger libraries, and updated technology. It will also feature state-of-the-art facilities, including a moot court room and a simulation lab.

The building is expected to be completed by the fall of 2023, and the campaign has already raised over $50 million towards the goal of $150 million.

In addition to the funds raised from alumni and donors, the university has also received a significant grant from the state of Virginia to help fund the project. The grant will cover 25% of the project's costs, which is expected to save the university millions of dollars in the long run.

The new building will not only improve the student experience, but it will also attract top-notch faculty and help the school maintain its position as one of the leading law schools in the country. The university is confident that the new building will be a major factor in its continued success.

The campaign is currently in the final stages, and the university is looking for additional donations to help secure the remaining funds needed to complete the project. There are a variety of ways to support the campaign, including direct donations, corporate sponsorships, and named gifts.

The university is excited to see the new building take shape and is grateful to all those who have supported the campaign so far. With your help, we can ensure that our students have the best possible educational experience.
