The Federal–State Standing Gap: How to Enforce Federal Law in Federal Court Without Article III Standing

Peter N. Salib

David K. Suska

Repository Citation

Copyright © 2018 by the authors. This article is brought to you by the William & Mary Law School Scholarship Repository. http://scholarship.law.wm.edu/wmborj
THE FEDERAL–STATE STANDING GAP: HOW TO ENFORCE FEDERAL LAW IN FEDERAL COURT WITHOUT ARTICLE III STANDING

Peter N. Salib* and David K. Suska

ABSTRACT

You, too, can sue Donald Trump under the Emoluments Clause!

Since Inauguration Day, several lawsuits have been filed against President Trump because of his refusal to divest certain assets. They assert that Trump’s business interests conflict with the Emoluments Clause of Article I. That arcane provision forbids certain federal officials from accepting any perquisite or gain from a foreign monarch or state. The suits contend, for example, that a foreign dignitary’s booking of a room at the Trump International Hotel in Washington, D.C. would constitute an unlawful emolument.

Most commentators quickly threw cold water on the prospect of any plaintiff prevailing. The trouble, they argued, is that plaintiffs cannot demonstrate a concrete and particularized injury from any putative violation of the Emoluments Clause. In legal-ese, they lack Article III standing. This skepticism was vindicated in December 2017, when a federal court dismissed one of the lawsuits for lack of Article III standing.

What no one has suggested is that plaintiffs do not need Article III standing to enforce the Emoluments Clause against Trump. Everyone assumes that these suits must live or die under federal standing doctrine. But, as we argue, Article III standing is essentially never a barrier to enforcing federal law. Indeed, plaintiffs may even win a merits ruling from the U.S. Supreme Court without ever possessing the elements of Article III standing.

If we are right, it is a big deal. Federal standing doctrine is understood to restrain federal courts from performing an advisory function. It also checks congressional power, preserving the Executive’s constitutional prerogative to enforce federal law. We challenge this received wisdom and argue that the Supreme Court has—perhaps unwittingly—created a route by which litigants may circumvent Article III’s standing requirements, diminishing the doctrine’s force. This has implications far beyond the Emoluments Clause; many constitutional and statutory provisions have long been thought effectively unenforceable because of the strictures of Article III standing.

This Article charts the course that no-standing plaintiffs may follow to enforce federal law and land in the U.S. Supreme Court. It also introduces a new term to the

* Associate, Sidley Austin LLP. Special thanks to William Baude, Aziz Huq, and Jonathan Masur for their insightful comments and critiques.
 Associate, Kellogg, Hansen, Todd, Figel & Frederick, PLLC.
legal lexicon: the Federal–State Standing Gap. This term describes the space between Article III standing doctrine and the comparatively lax doctrine of many states. We did not discover this space; everyone who has taken or taught a course on federal jurisdiction knows about it. But we do think it has gone underappreciated. And that is the gap in the literature that this Article begins to fill.

INTRODUCTION

This year is shaping up to be unprecedented in terms of popular familiarity with obscure constitutional provisions. Following Donald Trump’s November 2016 win in the Electoral College, many anti-Trump voters discovered an appreciation for the convoluted mechanism by which the President is selected.¹ Some engaged in a last-ditch effort to take advantage of it, urging electors to vote faithlessly and deny Trump the presidency.² Once that effort failed, attention shifted to the Emoluments Clause of Article I, which forbids any “Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust” from “accept[ing] . . . any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.”³ The word “emolument” is an archaic way of saying “perquisite, advantage, profit, or gain.”⁴ Even before Election Day, experts speculated that if President Trump did not divest from his estimable business holdings, he might be in violation of the Emoluments Clause from his first day in office.⁵ Some have contended, for example, that any foreign dignitary’s booking of a room at the Trump International Hotel in Washington, D.C., would constitute an unlawful emolument.⁶ Trump’s refusal to divest has thrust the issue into the headlines.⁷

Immediately after Inauguration Day, a group of ethics advocates and legal scholars sued President Trump in federal court, hoping to put this Emoluments

³ U.S. CONST. art. I, § 9, cl. 8. The Constitution also contains a so-called “Domestic Emoluments Clause,” see U.S. CONST. art. II, § 1, cl. 7, but it is not our focus.
⁴ Emolument, BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY (6th ed. 1990). We would agree with anyone who objects that “perquisite” is itself archaic. And we don’t mean to imply that Black’s provides the singular, accepted definition of the term. For historical context, see Emolument, BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY (10th ed. 2014); Emolument, BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY (1st ed. 1891). For a rundown of the possibilities, see John Mikhail, The Definition of “Emolument” in English Language and Legal Dictionaries, 1523–1806 (June 30, 2017) (unpublished manuscript), http://ssrn.com/abstract=2995693.
Clause theory to the test. In doing so, they dragged yet another arcane constitutional provision into the spotlight: Article III’s limit of federal jurisdiction to “Cases” and “Controversies,” as embodied in the Supreme Court’s jurisprudence on standing.

The group who brought the lawsuit was Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). Most commentators doubted CREW’s prospects for success, arguing that the organization cannot obviously show a “concrete and particularized” injury from any violation of the Emoluments Clause. In legalese, CREW seems to lack Article III standing. CREW argued that its diversion of resources to combat the President’s alleged violations constitutes the injury. At least one commentator agreed. But to improve its prospects, CREW joined D.C. hoteliers to the lawsuit, in the hope that they will have standing to sue. In December 2017, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York dismissed the suit, concluding that neither CREW nor the hoteliers had Article III standing. That is not the end of the matter, though. CREW has hinted at an appeal. Maryland and the District of Columbia have 8 See Zarroli, supra note 6. We take no position on this lawsuit’s wisdom or likelihood of success. Our interest here is academic and relates only to the question of standing.

---

9 U.S. Const. art. III, § 2.

10 See discussion infra Section I.A.

14 See Blackman, supra note 13.

filed similar suits in federal court. They may hope to avoid CREW’s difficulties by taking advantage of the “special solicitude” states are afforded in the standing analysis. The implication is clear: lawyers everywhere doubt that regular citizens can sue the President to stop him from violating the Emoluments Clause.

What no one has suggested, as far as we can tell, is that plaintiffs like CREW do not need standing to enforce the Emoluments Clause against Trump. Everyone assumes that these plaintiffs must live or die under the federal rules of standing. But, as we argue in this Article, lack of Article III standing is essentially never a barrier to enforcing federal law. Indeed, plaintiffs may gain a merits ruling from the U.S. Supreme Court without ever possessing the elements of standing.

If we are right, it is a big deal. Federal standing doctrine has long been thought to restrain federal courts’ power, preventing the judiciary from performing an advisory function. It also operates as a check on congressional power, preserving for the Executive the prerogative to enforce federal law. We take issue with this received wisdom and argue that the Supreme Court has—perhaps unwittingly—created a route by which litigants may circumvent standing requirements, diminishing the doctrine’s force.

24 If Congress could confer standing to sue on any private litigant, it would arguably impinge on the Executive’s authority to “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.” U.S. CONST. art. II, § 3. For a discourse on Article III standing as a separation of powers mechanism, see Antonin Scalia, The Doctrine of Standing As an Essential Element of the Separation of Powers, 17 SUFFOLK U. L. REV. 881 (1983).

25 See discussion infra Section II.A.
Perhaps more importantly, many putative violations of federal law go unexamined because it is unclear whether anyone has standing to sue in federal court. Examples include certain violations of the Establishment Clause, Statement and Account Clause, and Incompatibility Clause. Scholars have reflected on this problem, characterizing these and other provisions, such as the Take Care Clause, as functionally unenforceable. And the problem may extend to certain federal statutes such as the Fair Credit Reporting Act and Telephone Consumer Protection Act.

Our thesis therefore has implications far beyond CREW, Trump, and the Emoluments Clause. We propose that, under current doctrine, standing is essentially never a hurdle to enforcing any federal law—constitutional or otherwise. Almost any litigant can bring almost any federal claim, obtain relief, and, if the matter is sufficiently important, obtain a judgment from the U.S. Supreme Court. This means two things. First, federal laws traditionally regarded as unenforceable are almost certainly enforceable by someone. Second, the pool of plaintiffs who can sue under federal laws not traditionally considered difficult to enforce is broader than previously thought. Parties who would normally be kicked out of federal court for lack of standing have a path to federal review and, possibly, victory.

How can this be? The answer appears simple at first, especially to anyone who has ever taken or taught a course on federal jurisdiction: litigants should migrate to state court. State courts are not subject to Article III and its standing requirement. Many states consequently decline to require anything like Article III standing to sue in their courts, creating what we call the Federal–State Standing Gap.

Here, in brief, is how our method works. We use CREW’s Emoluments Clause suit as an example. As noted, a federal court dismissed CREW’s lawsuit for lack of 30 See, e.g., Bickers, supra note 26, at 449; David R. Dow, The Equal Protection Clause and the Legislative Redistricting Cases—Some Notes Concerning the Standing of White Plaintiffs, 81 MINN. L. REV. 1123, 1128 (1997) (“When a constitutional violation injures a significantly large number of citizens, no one has standing to sue.”).

32 Id.

33 See id.

34 See id.
standing. Dismissals for lack of standing amount to dismissals for lack of jurisdiction and are without prejudice, so the group is free to appeal and perhaps refile elsewhere. Instead of appealing or scrounging around for plaintiffs more likely to have standing in federal court, CREW should refile under its own name in some state court with relaxed standing requirements. State standing requirements, including those states with the most relaxed rules, are discussed in Section I.B. The defendant—Trump—will doubtless attempt to remove the case to federal court, anticipating another dismissal for lack of standing. As we explain in Section II.A.1, removal is unlikely. The case is, for now, stuck in state court.

CREW can seek in state court precisely what it would have sought from the lower federal courts. It can obtain relief—perhaps including a national injunction barring Trump from violating the Emoluments Clause. It may win appeals up to the highest state court, which can issue a precedential opinion in its favor. CREW might be quite pleased at this point, despite never having appeared in federal court. But the case is not over yet. The President will almost certainly petition the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, and the Supreme Court will likely grant it.

What happens next? One might assume that the Supreme Court is required to dismiss for lack of standing. But that is not our law. In ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, the U.S. Supreme Court held that it had the authority to review an Arizona Supreme Court decision regardless of whether the plaintiffs had Article III standing. Employing a kind of legal jiu jitsu, the Court flipped the standing inquiry on its head. It found that there was federal jurisdiction because the defendants, not the plaintiffs, had standing. The Court then ruled on the merits in the plaintiffs’ favor, affirming the judgment of the Arizona Supreme Court. We describe the ASARCO decision in Part II.

There you have it. The ASARCO plaintiffs were able to obtain victory in the U.S. Supreme Court without ever having to satisfy the standing requirement of Article III.

38 See discussion infra Section II.A.1; see also ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605 (1989).
39 See discussion infra Section III.A.
40 See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 612–24.
42 See generally id.
43 See generally id.
44 Id. at 618. More puzzlingly—and as discussed at length in Section IV.A—the standing-conferring injury identified by the Court was the state-court judgment entered against the defendant in the very case under review.
45 Id. at 633.
46 Id.
CREW could do the same. So might nearly anyone who wished to enforce a federal law previously thought unenforceable. The Federal–State Standing Gap allows almost anyone to bring a suit under almost any federal law. ASARCO clears a path to bring that victory to the highest federal court in the land.47

If ASARCO’s reasoning seems peculiar, we agree. In Section IV.A, we consider whether the decision is likely to be overturned. If it were, the Supreme Court would be obliged to dismiss the CREW suit for lack of jurisdiction, leaving the state-court judgment unmolested. As we discuss in Section IV.B, this would lead to another strange result. It would mean that many state-court decisions resolving important federal-law questions would be unreviewable by any federal court. Such a regime could allow—and perhaps invite—state courts to defy holdings of the U.S. Supreme Court.

What should we think of all of this? Impact litigators may be ecstatic to find that federal violations previously thought irremediable can, under ASARCO, be litigated before the U.S. Supreme Court. One might wonder why they aren’t already taking advantage of the rule, a question we consider in Part III. Others may be less enthusiastic. To them, it might appear that we are caught between Scylla and Charybdis—a world either with or without ASARCO. In the former, Article III’s standing requirement is subverted. In the latter, many state decisions become immune from federal review, perhaps inviting state courts to ignore the U.S. Supreme Court. How worried should we be about either possibility? Should we prefer one to the other? Section IV.B takes up these questions. And if one is unenthusiastic about both outcomes, one might wonder whether anyone—Congress, the Supreme Court, the President—might fashion a third way. We discuss this possibility in Section IV.C.

I. THE FEDERAL–STATE STANDING GAP

Many people care about the law’s enforcement—or at least they should. This is especially so when constitutional values are at stake. They should care very much, for example, about whether the government is promulgating laws respecting an establishment of religion, discriminating on the basis of race, or employing individuals ineligible for office. But if the provisions relevant to those questions are violated, often no one can do anything about it—at least not in federal court.48

The case-or-controversy requirement of the Article III places strict limits on who can sue in federal court.49 Those whom Article III permits to sue are said to have “standing.”50 In many cases, the class of individuals who have standing is dwarfed by the class of those who would like it.51 In some cases, it is unlikely that anyone

47 Id.
48 See Rooney et al., supra note 31.
50 See Scalia, supra note 24, at 882; see also Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 731–32 (1972) (defining “standing”).
51 See Scalia, supra note 24, at 891–92.
can sue.\textsuperscript{52} And even when \textit{someone} has the right to sue in federal court, standing doctrine often weeds out those most interested in doing so.\textsuperscript{53} Thus, for many litigants on both sides of the political divide, federal standing doctrine has long appeared an insurmountable barrier to enforcing the law.\textsuperscript{54}

Contrast Article III’s limit on who has standing to sue in federal court with the absence of any such limit on who has standing to sue in state court. Standing to sue in state court is a matter of state law.\textsuperscript{55} Many states have taken advantage of this autonomy to throw their courthouse doors open to just about anyone.\textsuperscript{56} The result is a gap between a litigant’s standing to sue in federal court and that same litigant’s standing to sue about the same alleged wrongdoing in state court. Call it the Federal–State Standing Gap.

Part I begins with an overview of federal standing doctrine and illustrations of how federal standing doctrine impedes the enforcement of federal law. Readers familiar with this material may prefer to skip to the discussion of state standing doctrine that follows. Part I concludes with reflection on the magnitude of the Federal–State Standing Gap, its consequences, and its opportunities for litigants.

\textbf{A. Federal Standing}

1. Doctrine

Try to explain federal standing doctrine to a non-lawyer, or even to a lawyer who never took a class on federal jurisdiction. You are sure to get strange looks. Something is counterintuitive about the proposition that someone could disregard federal law, even in an obvious way, and yet remain practically immune from suit in federal court. It does not clarify much to explain that standing doctrine comes from Article III, as an implicit limitation on “the judicial Power” that extends to “Cases” and “Controversies.”\textsuperscript{57} Some have therefore taken to a historical explanation that focuses on a gradual shift in the federal docket.\textsuperscript{58}

To make a long story short: Courts once were primarily in the business of private dispute resolution, but with the rise of the administrative state during the last century, they increasingly met the claims of citizen-plaintiffs seeking to calibrate and wield federal power.\textsuperscript{59} Tough questions then arose about the propriety of private \textsuperscript{52} See id.

\textsuperscript{53} See id.
\textsuperscript{54} See, e.g., Fallon, \textit{supra} note 26, at 3–4.
\textsuperscript{55} See ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 617 (1989); \textit{see also} Pennell v. City of San Jose, 485 U.S. 1, 8 (1988).
\textsuperscript{56} See, e.g., Rooney et al., \textit{supra} note 31.
\textsuperscript{57} U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2.
\textsuperscript{59} See id. at 194–95; \textit{see also} Frank H. Easterbrook, Foreword, \textit{The Court and the enforcement of the law. Private enforcement seems fine when the citizen-plaintiff resembles a traditional litigant, alleging that some legal wrong has inflicted harm. But what if the allegation is that a federal agency misread a federal statute and thereby increased the rate of extinction of endangered species in Egypt and Sri Lanka? It is this sort of nontraditional claim that has caused the Supreme Court to define and reinforce boundaries on who can sue in federal court.

Under current case law, plaintiffs must demonstrate three things to have standing to sue in federal court. First is an injury in fact. This means concrete and particularized harm, even intangible harm, but not harm in the abstract. And the harm must be actual or imminent, not speculative or conjectural. Second is that the injury is fairly traceable to the defendant. This is a causation requirement—plaintiffs cannot sue defendants to recover for the acts of third parties not before the court, nor can their theory of the case depend on an attenuated chain of events. Third is that the injury is redressable by a favorable ruling from the court. The requirement of redressability is grounded in the federal judiciary’s longstanding aversion to advisory opinions. If a favorable judgment can bring only psychic satisfaction, then it is thought to be nothing more than a conclusion that one side had the better of an argument in the “rarified atmosphere of a debating society.”

Economic System, 98 HARV. L. REV. 4, 4 (1984) (“Once, the Court was principally an arbiter of disputes among private parties.”).

See Fallon, supra note 26, at 1–8.

In the argot of legal theory, such a litigant is styled “Hohfeldian,” following Wesley Newcomb Hohfeld’s Some Fundamental Legal Conceptions As Applied in Judicial Reasoning, 23 YALE L.J. 16 (1913). See, e.g., Fallon, supra note 26, at 3 n.12 (“The terms ‘Hohfeldian’ and ‘non-Hohfeldian’ plaintiff have become terms of art in modern literature on standing.”).

Such a claim is nontraditional in the sense of being non-Hohfeldian. See discussion supra note 61; see also Scalia, supra note 24, at 881–82; Sunstein, supra note 58, at 194–95. Together these are “the irreducible constitutional minimum of standing.” Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560.

See Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560.

Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561; Simon, 426 U.S. at 38, 41–46.

See 13 CHARLES ALLEN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3529.1 (3d ed. 2017) (“The oldest and most consistent thread in the federal law of justiciability is that federal courts will not give advisory opinions.”); see also Correspondence of the Justices (1793), in RICHARD H. FALLON, JR. ET AL., HART AND WECHSLER’S THE FEDERAL COURTS AND THE FEDERAL SYSTEM 50–52 (7th ed. 2015).

2. How the Doctrine Impedes Enforcement of Federal Law

This triad of federal standing doctrine—jury in fact, traceability, and redressability—has bite. Standing is a jurisdictional prerequisite to suing in federal court, and the absence of any one of the triad deprives a court of power to adjudicate a plaintiff's claims. It is also a constitutional doctrine, deriving from Article III. Congress therefore cannot be sure that any statutory effort to expand a class of potential plaintiffs will hold up to judicial review.

Courts regularly invoke standing doctrine to deny parties redress of alleged harms. While such decisions matter a great deal to the plaintiffs denied a judicial forum, they are usually of little significance to anyone else. That is because, in most cases, even though some plaintiffs lack standing to challenge allegedly lawless conduct, there will be others who possess it. Assuming some such alternative plaintiff brings suit, the law may be enforced.

But standing does not only operate to bar particular plaintiffs from litigating putative violations of federal law. In some areas of public concern, it operates to shield violations from any remedy at all. These are not isolated cases. Often, a court’s ruling that no one has standing to enforce a particular violation renders an entire category of federal law unenforceable. Sometimes this is because, under the relevant doctrine, literally no one has standing to sue. In other cases, it is possible to imagine facts under which someone might have standing, but such plaintiffs will 75 See Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560–61.

76 See id. at 560; Scalia, supra note 24, at 882 (“The requirement of standing has been made part of American constitutional law through (for want of a better vehicle) the provision of Art. III, Sec. 2, which states that ‘the judicial Power shall extend’ to certain ‘Cases’ and ‘Controversies.’”).
77 See, e.g., Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1549 (2016) (“Congress’ role in identifying and elevating intangible harms does not mean that a plaintiff automatically satisfies the injury-in-fact requirement whenever a statute grants a person a statutory right and purports to authorize that person to sue to vindicate that right. Article III standing requires a concrete injury even in the context of a statutory violation.”).
78 See generally, e.g., Lujan, 504 U.S. 555.
79 See discussion supra Section I.A.1.
80 See, e.g., Wikimedia Found. v. Nat’l Sec. Agency, 857 F.3d 193, 200 (4th Cir. 2017) (holding that a complaint alleging harm from government surveillance survives a facial challenge to standing under Clapper v. Amnesty International USA, 568 U.S. 398 (2013), because the allegation of harm is not as speculative as it was in Clapper).
81 See, e.g., United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 179 (1974) (holding that in some cases, no citizen will have standing to bring a constitutional claim and therefore relief may be obtained in the judicial process).
82 See, e.g., Bickers, supra note 26, at 448–49.
83 See Clapper, 568 U.S. at 420–21 (acknowledging the possibility that no citizen may have standing to challenge a particular federal law).
either be rare or disinclined to litigate. Either way, standing doctrine works toward ensuring that certain violations of federal law go without a judicial remedy.

Establishment Clause case law is rich in examples of irremediable violations. In Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., the Supreme Court held that taxpayers had no standing to challenge the federal government’s gift of land to a Christian college. Taxpayers sometimes have standing to bring Establishment Clause challenges to federal expenditures made under the Spending Clause, but the land transfer was made under the Property Clause. The plaintiffs, the Court held, had no standing qua taxpayers to challenge the transfer under the Property Clause. Their injury was therefore a mere “generalized grievance,” shared equally by all. Such complaints cannot support a lawsuit in federal court.

The Third Circuit wrote in its opinion below that the plaintiffs in Valley Forge were “likely to be the best available.” “If they [did] not have standing,” the court thought, “it [was] probable that . . . [i]n respect to such [property transfers], the Establishment Clause would be rendered virtually unenforceable.” It is possible to imagine the occasional individual uniquely affected by the government’s gift of land—perhaps someone holds a contingent remainder defeated by the gift. But such individuals are rare enough as to be negligible. As things stand, it is unlikely that anyone can stop the government from giving gifts of property, no matter how preferential, to a religious (or anti-religion) group.

Roughly the same goes for many monetary subsidies of religious groups. The Supreme Court held in Flast v. Cohen that taxpayers have standing to mount...
Establishment Clause challenges to appropriations earmarked for religious groups.97 But it subsequently limited that decision in Hein v. Freedom from Religion Foundation, Inc.98 There, it held that Flast does not apply to discretionary spending paid for by general, religiously neutral, appropriations.99 Discretionary subsidies of religious organizations affect the public in almost the same way as the gift of property in Valley Forge.100 The injuries they might cause are just as generalized.101 Thus, as with Valley Forge, no one is likely to be able to sue for redress of the kind of violation at issue in Hein.

At least one federal circuit court has doubted whether anyone has standing to challenge government speech either praising or disparaging religion. In Freedom from Religion Foundation, Inc. v. Obama,102 plaintiffs alleged that President Obama’s address on the National Day of Prayer violated the Establishment Clause.103 The court held that the feeling of being excluded or made unwelcome by government speech failed to constitute a cognizable injury.104 “[H]urt feelings,” Judge Easterbrook wrote for the court, “differ from legal injury.”105 The opinion went on to muse that, because no one reasonably alters his behavior in response to mere speech, perhaps no one was harmed more seriously than the plaintiffs.106 “If this means that no one has standing,” the court wrote, “that does not change the outcome.”107

Standing doctrine might also operate to render putative violations of the Equal Protection Clause unenforceable. If the government’s religious speech fails to generate a cognizable injury, so might its racial speech—even if overtly hostile. The Fifth Circuit recently took that position in Moore v. Bryant.108 There, it held that when the government uses racially insensitive or disparaging language, the “stigma” caused by such speech “alone [is] insufficient to satisfy the injury-in-fact requirement.”109

There is also probably no one with standing to enjoin violations of the Incompatibility Clause.110 That provision forbids anyone from simultaneously holding a

---

97 Id. at 105–06.
99 Id. at 593.
100 See id. at 608–09.
101 Id. at 637 (Souter, J., dissenting) (arguing that the harms alleged in Flast are no greater than those alleged in Hein).
102 641 F.3d 803 (7th Cir. 2011).
103 Id. at 805.
104 See id. at 807.
105 Id.
106 See id. at 808; see also Harris v. City of Zion, 927 F.2d 1401, 1421 (7th Cir. 1991) (Easterbrook, J., dissenting) (arguing that a de minimis change in behavior, such as looking away from the offending speech, is not a cognizable injury), cert. denied, 505 U.S. 1229 (1992).
107 Freedom from Religion Found., 641 F.3d at 808.
109 Id. at 251–52.
110 U.S. CONST. art. I, § 6, cl. 2.
seat in the federal legislature and “holding any Office under the United States.”

There is, at least, no standing qua citizen or taxpayer. And the Supreme Court has acknowledged the possibility that, if citizens and taxpayers “have no standing to sue, no one [has] standing.” The Court has said much the same about the Statement and Account Clause, which requires the federal government to publicly report “Expenditures of all public Money.” Taxpayers have no standing to enforce it. There, too, the Court contemplated the likelihood that, if taxpayers are “not permitted to litigate this issue, no one can do so.” It found the possibility acceptable, writing that “the subject matter is committed to the surveillance of Congress, and ultimately to the political process.”

Even where standing doctrine fails to render a violation of federal law completely irremediable, it can often make enforcement substantially more difficult. This occurs when the courts rule that the parties most interested in enforcement lack standing. Other plaintiffs with standing may exist, but they will be comparatively difficult to find and unwilling to sue.

In Warth v. Seldin, a coalition of plaintiffs brought suit to challenge the zoning laws of Penfield, New York, which allegedly discriminated on the basis of income and, by extension, race. The Court assumed that the zoning laws “had the purpose and effect of excluding” poor minorities by keeping housing prices high. But, it held that the low-income minority plaintiffs lacked standing because they could not prove that an injunction against the laws would lower prices so that they could afford housing. Nor did residents of Penfield have standing based on their desire to live in an integrated community. Developers of low-income housing lacked standing because they could not point to any project being held up by the regulations.

---

111 Id.
113 Id. at 227.
114 U.S. CONST. art. I, § 9, cl. 7.
116 Id. at 179.
117 Id.
118 See Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 739–40 (1972) (noting that a special interest in a subject was not sufficient to render an individual aggrieved or adversely affected, significantly narrowing the pool of potential plaintiffs).
119 See id.
120 422 U.S. 490 (1975).
121 Id. at 495.
122 Id. at 502.
123 Id. at 503–04.
124 Id. at 512–13.
125 Id. at 516.
After Warth, who is left to challenge discriminatory zoning laws? The set is not null, but it is constrained. A developer who initiated a project but was blocked by the regulations would likely have standing. But a developer reckless enough—or committed enough to providing low-income housing—to commence a project it knows to be doomed is a rare bird. Warth does not render the Equal Protection Clause toothless as applied to zoning law.126 But it certainly makes litigation harder.

This is but a sampling of the cases where standing doctrine shields putative violations of federal law from being challenged in court. Others likely exist.127 As the standing problems in suits against Donald Trump demonstrate, violations of the Emoluments Clause might be among them. If standing were no object, these provisions of federal law could be given their full effect, rather than evading review on procedural grounds.

B. State Standing

State courts are not bound by Article III,128 a feature of our federalism with two implications. First is that plaintiffs who sue in state courts need not worry about the strictures of federal standing doctrine.129 Indeed, many states have adopted a comparatively lax doctrine that permits citizens to sue for generalized grievances.130 Second is that there is heterogeneity in standing doctrine among the states—without the anchor of Article III, states have been free to drift.131 This heterogeneity probably reflects institutional differences—for example, whether a state’s judiciary is elected, the terms of judges’ tenure, the text of state constitutions and ease of amendment.132

126 See id. at 522 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (noting that the purpose of the ordinance was to prevent non-white citizens from living in the town).

127 Consider, for example, Lee v. Oregon, 107 F.3d 1382 (9th Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 927 (1997). It seems to imply that only those on the precipice of death at their doctors’ hands have standing to bring a constitutional challenge to Oregon’s assisted suicide law. If that is right, potential plaintiffs are as likely to end up dead as they are parties to a federal lawsuit.

128 See, e.g., ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 617 (1989) (“We have recognized often that the constraints of Article III do not apply to state courts, and accordingly the state courts are not bound by the limitations of a case or controversy or other federal rules of justiciability even when they address issues of federal law . . . .”).

129 See id.

130 For analysis of states’ standing doctrine, see two helpful notes: M. Ryan Harmanis, Note, States’ Stances on Public Interest Standing, 76 OHIO ST. L.J. 729 (2015); John DiManno, Note, Beyond Taxpayers’ Suits: Public Interest Standing in the States, 41 CONN. L. REV. 639 (2008).

131 See Harmanis, supra note 130, at app. 760–63.

132 For example, we might expect states with a more democratically accountable judiciary to have a more relaxed standing doctrine. See Helen Hershkoff, State Courts and the “Passive Virtues”: Rethinking the Judicial Function, 114 HARV. L. REV. 1833, 1886–88 (2001); DiManno, supra note 130, at 657–63.
It may also reflect historical differences—for example, the traditional role of one state’s judiciary in governing through the common law relative to another, or the traditional prominence of a state’s judges relative to its legislators.

The best way to explore state standing doctrines is through sampling. Below we consider three states, each of which has embraced an approach that makes its courts more hospitable to nontraditional plaintiffs than are the federal courts, and each of which serves as an example of standing doctrine in other states.

Michigan offers an instructive place to start because the Michigan Supreme Court recently abandoned its faith in federal standing doctrine. The shift came in Lansing Schools Educational Ass’n v. Lansing Board of Education. Plaintiffs were four teachers and their unions. They sued in state court to force district officials to expel students who had allegedly assaulted the teachers. Michigan law then required the expulsion of any student who assaulted a teacher, but district officials had decided that suspensions would be appropriate. The district moved to dismiss for lack of standing. They contended that the teachers were not injured by the decision to suspend the students, and that any injury would not be redressable with a favorable judgment because discretion is given to the findings of district officials about whether there had been an assault.

The Michigan Supreme Court rejected these arguments and endorsed an expansive theory of standing. The court explained that “standing historically developed in Michigan as a limited, prudential doctrine that was intended to ensure sincere and 134 Cf. Hershkoff, supra note 132, at 1891–92.

---

135 For a fifty-state survey, see Harmanis, supra note 130, at app. 760–63.

136 Again, we use nontraditional in the non-Hohfeldian sense. See discussion supra notes 61, 63.

138 See Lansing Schools, 792 N.W.2d at 695–96.

139 792 N.W.2d 686 (Mich. 2010). Lansing Schools overruled Lee v. Macomb County Board of Commissioners, 629 N.W.2d 900 (Mich. 2001), and later cases that had adopted the requirements set out in Lujan.

140 Lansing Schools, 792 N.W.2d at 689.

141 See id.

143 See Lansing Schools, 792 N.W.2d at 689.

144 Id.

145 See id.

146 See id. at 688.
vigorous advocacy by litigants.”147 Following that approach, “a [plaintiff] has standing whenever there is a legal cause of action.”148 And even when there is not obviously a legal cause of action, a plaintiff may have standing if he demonstrates “a substantial interest [in the law’s enforcement] that is detrimentally affected in a manner distinct from that of the general public.”149 The court concluded that the teachers and unions fell into this latter category; their interest in the matter would promote sufficient advocacy for the court to arrive at a sound decision.150 In other words, it did not matter whether they suffered harm from the decision to suspend rather than expel the students. It also did not matter whether they were in fact the ones who had endured the alleged assaults.151 What mattered was that the legal issues would be adequately developed by the individuals and organizations who sued.152

The New Jersey Supreme Court has recently explained the proudly relaxed approach that it takes to standing:

Our liberal rules of standing are animated by a venerated principle: In the overall we have given due weight to the interests of individual justice, along with the public interest, always bearing in mind that throughout our law we have been sweepingly rejecting procedural frustrations in favor of just and expeditious determinations on the ultimate merits. And that principle is premised on a core concept of New Jersey jurisprudence, that is, that our rules of procedure were not designed to create an injustice and added complications but, on the contrary, were devised and promulgated for the purpose of promoting reasonable uniformity in the expeditious and even administration of justice.153

To have standing to sue in New Jersey, then, a plaintiff must demonstrate only “a sufficient stake and real adverseness with respect to the subject matter of the litigation.”154 The New Jersey Supreme Court has on occasion stated that a plaintiff must demonstrate “a substantial likelihood of some harm . . . in the event of an unfavorable decision,”155 and at a glance this resembles the injury-in-fact and redressability requirements of federal doctrine. Yet in the Mt. Laurel Cases,156 the New Jersey 147 Id. at 692 (internal quotation marks omitted).

148 Id. at 699.
149 Id. at 702.
150 See id. at 699–702.
151 See id. at 701 (“[T]eachers who work in a public school have a significant interest distinct from that of the general public in the enforcement of MCL 380.1311a(1).”).
152 See id.
154 Id. at 801 (citation omitted).
155 Id. at 802 (citation omitted).
Supreme Court held that an organization had standing to challenge exclusionary zoning practices because the organization “ha[d] the objective of” ending such practices.\textsuperscript{157} This is a near-circular approach that seems to throw open the doors of state courthouses to motivated plaintiffs.

Ohio courts recite standing requirements that mirror the federal triad,\textsuperscript{158} but the Ohio Supreme Court has long recognized an exception “when the issues sought to be litigated are of great importance and interest to the public.”\textsuperscript{159} This so-called “public-right doctrine” is invoked by plaintiffs who sue to compel government officials to act in compliance with state and federal law, but who cannot show any unique harm from the officials’ alleged wrongdoing.\textsuperscript{160} In \textit{State ex rel. Newell v. Brown},\textsuperscript{161} for example, the plaintiff sought to forbid a state official from printing and distributing ballots that listed particular candidates for judgeships.\textsuperscript{162} The plaintiff contended that these candidates were nominated pursuant to an unconstitutional statutory scheme, but he sued only “as a citizen, taxpayer and elector” who was “interested in the execution of the laws.”\textsuperscript{163} The Ohio Supreme Court concluded that the plaintiff had standing to sue.\textsuperscript{164} The court reasoned that “as a matter of public policy, a citizen of a community does have such an interest in his government as to give him capacity to maintain a proper action to enforce the performance of a public duty affecting himself as a citizen and citizens generally.”\textsuperscript{165} In its most recent decisions on standing, the Ohio Supreme Court has cautioned that the public-right doctrine applies only in “rare cases” that present “exceptional circumstances,”\textsuperscript{166} yet the court continues to rely on the doctrine to permit plaintiffs to sue for generalized grievances.\textsuperscript{167}

\textsuperscript{157} \textit{Mt. Laurel II}, 456 A.2d at 483 (“[W]e hold that . . . any organization that has the objective of[] securing lower income housing opportunities in a municipality will have standing to sue . . . .”).

\textsuperscript{158} See, e.g., Moore v. City of Middletown, 975 N.E.2d 977, 982 (Ohio 2012).

\textsuperscript{159} \textit{State ex rel. Ohio Acad. of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward}, 715 N.E.2d 1062, 1082 (Ohio 1999).

\textsuperscript{160} The Ohio Supreme Court has clarified that the doctrine applies only in original actions for a writ of mandamus or prohibition. \textit{See ProgressOhio.org, Inc. v. JobsOhio}, 13 N.E.3d 1101, 1105 (Ohio 2014).

\textsuperscript{161} 122 N.E.2d 105 (Ohio 1954).

\textsuperscript{162} \textit{See id.} at 106.

\textsuperscript{163} \textit{Id.} at 106–07 (citation omitted).

\textsuperscript{164} \textit{See id.} at 107.

\textsuperscript{165} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{166} \textit{State ex rel. Ohio AFL-CIO v. Ohio Bureau of Workers’ Comp.}, 780 N.E.2d 981, 985 (Ohio 2002) (citation omitted).

\textsuperscript{167} \textit{State ex rel. Ohio Acad. of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward}, 715 N.E.2d 1062, 1084 (Ohio 1999) (“[T]here can be no doubt that the issues sought to be litigated in this case are of such a high order of public concern as to justify allowing this action as a public action.”).
C. The Standing Gap and Its Consequences

Now we can see a clear gap between federal and state standing requirements. Federal standing requirements are strict. They erect a barrier to adjudication for litigants who cannot demonstrate injury, traceability, and redressability. But many states take the opposite approach, employing flexible heuristics when deciding who can sue in their courts. What difference does this distinction make?

The states discussed above can be sorted into three rough categories. First, some states have effectively no standing requirement at all. New Jersey fits best into this category. Its courts nominally require “a sufficient stake and real adverseness” to bring suit. But if those requirements are met by any plaintiff who “has the objective of” winning his lawsuit, it is hard to see how standing requirements ever present an obstacle to litigation in New Jersey. States like Michigan add the minimal criterion of sufficient adversity. These states do not require anything like a “concrete and particularized injury” to bring suit. But they do bar plaintiffs who cannot be expected to adequately develop and argue the relevant legal issues. A plaintiff who could demonstrate neither an injury nor a longstanding interest in a case’s subject matter might have difficulty suing in these states. Finally, states like Ohio add a public-interest requirement. We question whether Ohio in particular takes this requirement seriously. But even lax enforcement of a public interest requirement might prevent some plaintiffs without federal standing from suing states like these.

II. USING THE STANDING GAP TO ENFORCE FEDERAL LAW

A. Bridging the Gap: Enforcing Federal Law in Federal Court Without Article III Standing

Now we are ready to lay out the details of our method for enforcing federal law in federal court without Article III standing. The gist is this: plaintiffs can initiate 168 See Rooney et al., supra note 31.

---

169 See id.
170 See, e.g., id.
171 See supra notes 153–57 and accompanying text.
172 See supra notes 153–57 and accompanying text.
175 See supra notes 138–52 and accompanying text.
176 See supra notes 64–67.
177 See, e.g., supra notes 146–48.
178 While the court in Lansing Schools held that a plaintiff may still have standing when legal action was not obvious, the plaintiff needed a substantial interest that was unique from the general public. 792 N.W.2d 686, 702 (Mich. 2010).
179 See supra notes 158–67 and accompanying text.
suits in state courts with lax standing requirements. U.S. Supreme Court precedent then works as a bridge to federal review. We continue to use CREW’s Emoluments Clause suit against Trump as an example. Any plaintiff worried that he lacks standing to sue in federal court could follow the same path.

1. Step One: Winning in State Court

We suppose for purposes of this example that CREW lacks standing to sue under the Emoluments Clause in federal court. A federal district court has already reached this conclusion,\(^\text{180}\) and so we really only suppose that this judgment would be affirmed if appealed. CREW should therefore start fresh in some state court where standing will not be a hurdle. Where? As discussed in Section I.C, even among states with relaxed standing requirements there is variance in who can sue under what law. CREW should face no obstacle to litigation in any of the states we described above. It could sue in a state like New Jersey, which has functionally no standing requirement.\(^\text{181}\) It could also sue in a state like Michigan, since there is reason to think that CREW—an organization dedicated to policing government ethics—will adequately develop and argue the Emoluments Clause question.\(^\text{182}\) Nor should CREW have difficulty suing in a state with a public-interest requirement, such as Ohio.\(^\text{183}\)

CREW has options, so it should file suit wherever it feels most confident it can win. As we will discuss below, winning in state court is essential to obtaining federal review. New Jersey may be a promising venue. It is probably the most politically liberal of the lax-standing states discussed above,\(^\text{184}\) and CREW might expect the state’s judiciary to reflect its population. Or if some other state’s judiciary has taken a hard line against corruption, CREW might be inclined to sue there.

Imagine that the CREW suit is now filed in New Jersey state court. What next? One might expect Trump to swiftly remove the case. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1441, a civil action brought in state court may be removed by the defendant to a federal district court with "original jurisdiction" over it.\(^\text{185}\) Assume Trump removed the CREW lawsuit under § 1441 to the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. As \(^{181}\) See Rooney et al., supra note 31.

\(^{182}\) See discussion supra Section I.B.

\(^{183}\) See discussion supra Section I.B.

\(^{185}\) 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a) (2012) ("[A]ny civil action brought in a State court of which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction, may be removed by the defendant or the defendants, to the district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where such action is pending.").
above, we assume that CREW cannot meet the requirements for Article III standing in federal court. Standing is a jurisdictional requirement in federal court, so the district court lacks original jurisdiction.186 By § 1441’s terms, removal is improper, and the case must remain in state court.187 CREW’s very obstacle to federal adjudication on the merits is thus its anchor allowing for state-court review.

Much more likely, though, is that Trump invokes 28 U.S.C. § 1442, which authorizes removal of any suit “against . . . any officer . . . of the United States or of any agency thereof . . . for or relating to any act under color of such office.”188 Unlike § 1441, the text in § 1442 does not make jurisdiction in the district court a prerequisite for removal.189 The Supreme Court has interpreted § 1442’s removal right broadly—going so far as to characterize it as “absolute”—to ensure that federal officers have a federal forum in which to assert immunity from state law under the Supremacy Clause.190 This has led some to suggest that a district court should dismiss a no-standing suit removed under § 1442.191 If CREW’s case were removed and dismissed, it would trigger a Sisyphean cycle. Dismissals for lack of jurisdiction are without prejudice,192 so CREW could refile in state court. But Trump would remove again, the suit would be dismissed again . . . and the litigation would die.194

Happily for CREW, the removal statutes suggest a different outcome. Congress has made clear that a remand to state court, not dismissal, is the appropriate disposition of any no-standing case removed to federal court.195 Under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(c), “[i]f at any time before final judgment it appears that the district court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, the case shall be remanded.”196 Standing is a jurisdictional requirement, so a lack of standing triggers § 1447(c)’s remand provision.197 The statute applies on its face to all removals, making no distinction between § 1441 and § 1442.198

The Supreme Court agrees. In International Primate Protection League v. Administrators of Tulane Educational Fund,199 a federal agency removed a suit about custody of monkeys used for medical research under § 1442(a)(1). The Court held that § 1442(a)(1) does not authorize federal agencies to remove and that the district court lacked jurisdiction to hear the case. The Court explained its holding with respect to the district court’s jurisdiction in a cryptic footnote that seemed to adopt the Fifth Circuit’s conclusion that plaintiffs “lack[ed] [Article III] standing to protect the monkeys.” The Court then remanded the action to state court under § 1447(c), overturning the Fifth Circuit’s decision to dismiss. According to the Court, § 1447(c) supplies “no discretion to dismiss rather than remand an action” over which the district court lacks jurisdiction.

The structure of § 1447 also points toward § 1447(c)’s applicability in § 1442 removals. Section 1447(d) makes orders to remand non-appealable, except in cases removed under § 1442. The Supreme Court has held that § 1447(d)’s bar on appealability applies only to orders to remand under § 1447(c). If § 1447(c) were inapplicable to § 1442 removals, then no orders to remand would fall under § 1447(d)’s exception to non-appealability. The exception would be superfluous. Only if § 1447(c) applies to cases removed under § 1442 do all parts of § 1447(d) have effect.

Such remands under § 1447(c) create no conflict with the Supreme Court’s insistence on a broad—perhaps “absolute”—right of removal under § 1442. At least they do not in the cases we care about. Federal officers’ right of removal is supposed to give them a federal forum in which to mount a defense of federal law preempting state law. But this Article is not about enforcing state law against anyone. It is about enforcing federal law without Article III standing. So the preemption defense simply does not arise. The rationale for a broad right of removal therefore does not favor dismissal in the CREW case or any other case under federal law. Trump cannot scuttle CREW’s lawsuit in state court through removal under § 1442. The state-court litigation proceeds.213

But staying in state court is not enough; CREW needs to win. As we will discuss below, federal review of federal claims is available to plaintiffs without standing only if they win in state court.214 CREW’s goal here is to obtain a judgment in its favor either from the Supreme Court of New Jersey or from the New Jersey Appellate Division with the Supreme Court of New Jersey then denying review. Either outcome allows the defendant—Trump in our example—to petition the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari.215

There is little more to say if CREW immediately wins in the New Jersey trial and appellate courts—at least for now. But what if CREW loses? Suppose it wins at trial and on appeal, but the Supreme Court of New Jersey ultimately rules against it. Is the journey toward federal review over? Happily for CREW, the story does not end here. As discussed above, there are many states with lax standing requirements.216 So CREW can try again in another state’s system, perhaps in Michigan or Ohio.

One might object here that rules of claim and issue preclusion, along with the Full Faith and Credit Clause,217 prevent CREW from relitigating the claim it has just lost. That would be right if CREW were to refile under its own name in another state.218 But it does not need to do that. It can recruit any of the numerous other plaintiffs likely to have standing in a state court with lax requirements.219 For some states, anyone will do. Once CREW locates a plaintiff, claim and issue preclusion cease to apply because both require some identity of litigants.220 For claim preclusion to apply, both litigants must be identical to—or in privity with—those in the original litigation.221 CREW’s new plaintiff will be neither. Issue preclusion merely requires that the party against whom preclusion is asserted have been a party to the original litigation.222 CREW’s new plaintiff, as a non-party to the original suit, will be immune.223

The Full Faith and Credit Clause, as relevant here, requires a state to give only as much preclusive effect to the judgment of a sister state as would the state that

---

214 See discussion infra Section II.A.2.
216 See discussion supra Section I.B.
217 See U.S. CONST. art. IV, § 1.
218 See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 24 (AM. LAW INST. 1982).
219 See generally DiManno, supra note 130; Harmanis, supra note 130.
220 See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 24.
221 See id.
222 Id. §§ 27, 29.
223 A court might consider CREW to have had a “sufficient ‘laboring oar’” in the first litigation to be treated as a party for purposes of preclusion. Montana v. United States, 440 U.S. 147, 155 (1979) (quoting Drummond v. United States, 324 U.S. 316, 318 (1945)).
rendered it. Because neither claim nor issue preclusion would apply in New Jersey against CREW’s new plaintiff, they need not apply in other states. Moreover, no state judiciary is required to acquiesce to the legal reasoning of its sister states; where one state court finds no Emoluments Clause violation, another state court may find a flagrant one.

Assume CREW eventually convinces a state’s highest court to rule in its favor. President Trump could give up here. More likely, he will petition the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. Given the magnitude of this hypothetical case, the Supreme Court is almost certain to grant certiorari.

2. Step Two: Reaching the Supreme Court via ASARCO

What happens once the U.S. Supreme Court grants certiorari in our illustrative case? As we emphasized above, Article III’s case-or-controversy requirement is a limit on the adjudicatory power of all federal courts. That includes the Supreme Court. One might therefore expect the Supreme Court to dismiss the CREW suit for lack of standing. If it did so, the state court judgment would stand, rendering a state court the final arbiter of the federal constitutional provision.

But the Supreme Court, under current law, need not dismiss CREW’s suit for lack of jurisdiction. The precedent is clear on this point. In ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, the Court firmly established its ability to review such cases. In doing so, the Justices—intentionally or not—created a mechanism for litigants who lack Article III standing to nevertheless enforce federal laws in the highest federal court.

In ASARCO, a group of taxpayers and teachers in Arizona sought to challenge the state’s mineral-lease scheme under a federal statute and the state constitution. The substance of their challenge is unimportant. Two things do matter. First, these plaintiffs did not have Article III standing to sue in federal court. Second, although not intentionally trying to avoid the standing requirement, the ASARCO plaintiffs 224 U.S. CONST. art. IV, § 1 (“Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records, and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.”); see also Riley v. N.Y. Trust Co., 315 U.S. 343, 349 (1942).

225 See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF JUDGMENTS § 24.
227 See discussion supra Section I.A.
228 See discussion infra Sections IV.B–C.
229 See generally ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605 (1989) (holding that the Supreme Court may exercise jurisdiction on appeal from a state court even if the plaintiffs would not have had standing to bring suit in federal court).
230 See id. at 624.
231 See generally id.
232 See id. at 610.
233 See id. at 618.
followed the pattern we have laid out so far. They filed their case in state court and won a judgment from the Supreme Court of Arizona.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it could review the judgment in a fractured opinion. Justice Kennedy, joined by three others, found that the plaintiffs would have lacked standing had they originally filed in federal court. Justice Brennan, also joined by three others, declined to decide the question. What six Justices agreed upon was that it did not matter whether the plaintiffs had Article III standing. The Supreme Court could review the case either way.

Turning the traditional standing inquiry on its head, the Court held that it was sufficient to satisfy the strictures of Article III that the defendants, rather than the plaintiffs, had standing. This was because "the defendants in the case and the losing parties below . . . brought the case [to the Supreme Court] and thus [sought] entry to the federal courts for the first time." Under ASARCO, the party who needs standing is ostensibly the party who first invokes the power of the federal courts.

Once the Court determined that the defendants’ standing would be sufficient to satisfy Article III, it turned to the question of whether the defendants had standing. As described above, standing requires an injury-in-fact, traceability, and redressability. One might wonder how the defendants could demonstrate an injury. There were no counterclaims by which they might have alleged harm.

Instead of looking outside of the litigation to see whether the defendants in ASARCO had suffered an injury, the Court looked within it. It held that the state-court judgment against the defendant, issued in the very litigation under review, constituted an injury for purposes of Article III. The Court held that “as a result of the state-court judgment, the case has taken on such definite shape that [the defendants] are under a defined and specific legal obligation, one which causes them direct injury.” Such an injury—if it is indeed a proper injury for purposes of the standing inquiry—is obviously traceable and redressable. As the Court wrote, “our reversal of the decision below would remove its disabling effects upon [defendants]. In these

$^{234}$ See id. at 610.
$^{235}$ See id.
$^{236}$ See generally id.
$^{237}$ See id. at 616–17 (plurality opinion).
$^{238}$ See id. at 633–34 (Brennan, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).
$^{239}$ See id. at 617–24 (majority opinion).
$^{240}$ See generally id.
$^{241}$ See id. at 618.
$^{242}$ See id.
$^{243}$ See id. at 618–19.
$^{244}$ See discussion infra Section I.A.
$^{245}$ See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 617–18.
$^{246}$ See id. at 618.
$^{247}$ Id.
$^{248}$ See discussion infra Section IV.A.
circumstances, we conclude that [defendants] meet each prong of the constitutional standing requirements." The Court went on to review the case on the merits, ruling in favor of the plaintiffs.251

Here we finally have it—federal review of a federal claim without the plaintiffs ever having to demonstrate Article III standing. Under the plainest reading of the ASARCO opinion, no plaintiff ever needs standing to litigate the merits of a federal claim in the U.S. Supreme Court.252 Anyone can file suit in a state court with lax standing requirements.253 If the plaintiff wins, the Supreme Court can take the case,254 Article III be damned. This applies to CREW and the Emoluments Clause. But it also applies to other plaintiffs concerned about constitutional and statutory violations commonly thought difficult to enforce.255 Article III’s standing requirement is diminished as a barrier to federal review.

We pause for a moment to make two notes. First, it should now be clear why winning in state court is essential for parties seeking no-standing, federal-court enforcement of federal laws. The injury providing ASARCO’s defendants standing was the state-court judgment against them.256 In the absence of such a judgment, there is no injury, no defendant with standing, and no power for the Supreme Court to consider the case on its merits.257 A state-court judgment against the plaintiffs would not be sufficient.258 In that case, the plaintiffs, not the defendants, would be the parties “seek[ing] entry to the federal courts for the first time in the lawsuit.”259 Then, the plaintiffs’ standing, not the defendants’, would be at issue.260 A state-court judgment against the plaintiffs would merely deny them relief.261 It would not impose a “defined and specific legal obligation” sufficient to constitute an injury under ASARCO.262 Thus, only victorious plaintiffs may obtain Supreme Court review under ASARCO, an oddity that the ASARCO Court itself acknowledged.263

Second, we emphasize again that, although the ASARCO Court may well have failed to anticipate the consequences of its decision, it is nevertheless the law. The 250 ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 618–19.

251 See id. at 633.
252 See id.
253 See generally DiManno, supra note 130; Harmanis, supra note 130.
254 Of course, the Supreme Court agrees to decide only about 1% of cases it is asked to decide each year. See Frequently Asked Questions: General Information, SUP. CT. OF THE U.S., http://www.supremecourt.gov/about/faq_general.aspx [https://perma.cc/R3CY-QZ4S] (last visited Apr. 12, 2018) [hereinafter Frequently Asked Questions].
255 See discussion supra Section I.A.2.
256 ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 618.
257 See id.
258 See id.
259 Id.
260 See id.
261 See id.
262 Id.
263 See id. at 624.
opinions in ASARCO do not evince that the plaintiffs there were working strategically to avoid Article III’s strictures. The Court therefore may have overlooked the fact that its holding would bridge the Federal–State Standing Gap, providing the possibility of federal review to plaintiffs without Article III standing. Indeed, everyone seems to have overlooked it. Since its issuance, ASARCO has never been cited by the U.S. Supreme Court to justify review of a case in which the plaintiffs lacked Article III standing. Nor is there any case revealing even a hint of plaintiff’s strategic avoidance of the standing requirement. The Supreme Court did not appear to anticipate that, post-ASARCO, plaintiffs could do what we’ve described.

Here is where the law stands. Because of the Federal–State Standing Gap, almost any plaintiff can sue to enforce almost any federal law. Article III is no impediment. And if a plaintiff wins in state court, it has an opportunity to litigate on the merits in the U.S. Supreme Court. This diminishes Article III as a barrier to litigation in federal court. But it potentially empowers litigants like CREW that wish to enforce provisions of federal law previously regarded as unenforceable in federal court. Plaintiffs do not seem to have caught on to this yet. Case in point: the debate around the CREW litigation is about whether Article III standing is present, not whether it is necessary. But once plaintiffs come to appreciate ASARCO and the standing gap, the methods by which federal law is enforced may change permanently.

B. Shooting the Gap

Terminal State Court Review As an Attractive Alternative to Federal Court

CREW’s case is incendiary. They accuse the President of violating the Constitution and seek an injunction barring him from retaining ownership in his multibillion-dollar

---

264 See generally id.

265 In Nike, Inc. v. Kasky, 539 U.S. 654 (2003) (per curiam), the Court dismissed as improvidently granted a petition that had cited ASARCO to justify certiorari notwithstanding doubts about plaintiffs’ standing. In opinions accompanying the DIG, some of the Justices debated whether ASARCO should extend to cases in which the state court had not yet entered judgment against the defendant. Id. at 661–64 (Stevens, J., concurring); id. at 670 (Breyer, J., dissenting). In Virginia v. Hicks, 539 U.S. 113, 120 (2003), the Justices recognized Virginia’s standing under ASARCO in lieu of deciding whether a defendant had standing to mount a facial challenge to a criminal statute.

266 States enforce their criminal laws in their own courts, so there is no possibility that Virginia brought the state-law prosecution in Hicks to avoid Article III’s strictures.

268 “Shooting the gap” is a phrase used to describe a football player who aggressively defends by exploiting space between the opposing team’s linemen. See, e.g., Gregg Easterbrook, The All-Unwanted All-Pros, Conference Championship Analysis, and More, ESPN (Jan. 24, 2008, 4:44 PM), http://www.espn.com/espn/page2/story?page=easterbrook/080122 [https://perma.cc/3FXU-9NNV] (“New England linebacker Junior Seau . . . shot the gap behind the play and tackled the runner for a loss . . . .”). If one finds football analogies helpful, consider the tactic discussed supra Section II.A as an “end run” around jurisdictional rules. Cf. Burris
If they were to follow our method, refile in a state court with lax standing requirements, and win, the Supreme Court would almost certainly grant certiorari. They would thus be able to enforce federal law in federal court without Article III standing. Other impact litigators bringing similarly high-profile cases might have a good chance of doing the same. But what about litigants without standing who wish to bring less significant federal-law cases? Given the small percentage of cases in which the Supreme Court grants certiorari, they are unlikely to achieve what ASARCO makes possible. Does our method leave them in the lurch?

The Federal–State Standing Gap still gives such plaintiffs what they seek. Lax state standing rules create a gap in Article III’s defense against private enforcement of federal law through which litigants can break. Filing in a state court and failing to obtain Supreme Court review is, we argue, almost as good as filing in federal court and achieving the same outcome.

Nearly any federal claim that plaintiffs might want to bring in federal court can be brought in state court. Most state courts have general jurisdiction. They can hear any state-law claim and nearly any federal-law claim. The only exception is for federal claims in areas where Congress has provided for exclusive federal jurisdiction. Bankruptcy, antitrust, patent, and copyright cases are the notable examples.

Plaintiffs can also obtain suitable remedies from a state court. As discussed below, state courts can award declaratory relief and damages to the same extent as federal courts. And while some have thought otherwise, we argue below that state courts have equitable power commensurate with that of the federal courts. This includes the power to issue national injunctions binding federal officials.

Finally, just as would be the case if plaintiffs sued in a lower federal court but failed to obtain Supreme Court review, state-court litigation produces binding precedent. True, a decision from a federal court of appeals binds federal courts in 269 See Zarroli, supra note 6.

---

270 See Frequently Asked Questions, supra note 254.
273 See, e.g., Haywood, 556 U.S. at 739.
276 See discussion infra Section III.A.
277 See discussion infra Section III.A.
several states, while a state appellate court binds only the state’s judiciary. But that does not render state-court decisions less important than federal-court decisions. A decision of the Supreme Court of California binds more people than the population within the Tenth Circuit.

III. WHY ISN’T EVERYONE DOING THIS ALREADY?

The preceding discussion demonstrates how the Federal–State Standing Gap, along with ASARCO, makes it possible for plaintiffs without Article III standing to enforce federal law in federal court. And even plaintiffs who use our method but fail to obtain Supreme Court review have access to state-court adjudication on a par with that of the federal courts. The upshot is that Article III standing is essentially never an impediment to any plaintiff wishing to enforce federal law. We expect this result to surprise many. But more surprising, we think, is that nobody seems to be wielding the precedent to their advantage. Part III reflects on why that might be the case.

We start from the premise that litigators are rational actors and first consider whether inadequate remedies or onerous procedures drive plaintiffs away from state court. We then relax the assumption of rationality and suggest a more provocative explanation.

A. Are State-Court Remedies Inadequate?

Again, we start from the premise that litigators are rational. Whether their goal in any case is to secure damages, test the constitutionality of state action, or reshape policy, what they need is a judgment on the merits. There ought to be a good reason, then, that the Federal–State Standing Gap is not exploited to elude a dismissal for lack of standing in federal court.

The simplest explanation for litigators’ aversion to state court could be that state-court remedies are inadequate. It would be senseless to litigate in a forum that could not award the relief you desire. Even constitutional lawsuits are not entirely academic affairs.

relief is generally available against federal officials. The power to award damages and injunctions is likely inherent in Article III’s investiture of the “judicial power” in the Supreme Court and inferior courts, at least in cases for which the court has subject-matter jurisdiction. The power to award declaratory relief is statutorily conferred and of comparatively recent vintage. Federal courts also have the authority and obligation to calibrate each form of relief so that it is complete but not more.

How do state-court remedies compare?

1. Damages

State courts can issue damages judgments for federal claims to at least the same extent as federal courts, including against federal officials. The Supreme Court recognized state courts’ authority to award damages against federal officials as early as 1851. Plaintiffs suing federal officials in state court have to wrangle with sovereign and official immunities, but that is true in federal court as well. And no matter the forum, plaintiffs avoid sovereign immunity when they seek compensation from a federal officer in his individual capacity. Some may assume that the Westfall Act is an insuperable obstacle to suing federal officials for damages in state court. But that statute preempts certain suits against federal officials under state law, and this is 283 Federal courts may order prospective relief against state officials so as to bar those officials from violating federal law. See, e.g., Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 664 (1974); Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908).

---

284 See, e.g., In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564, 599 (1895) (stating that the power to enjoin is “recognized from ancient times and by indubitable authority”); Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163 (1803) (“[I]t is a general and indisputable rule, that where there is a legal right, there is also a legal remedy . . . .” (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)).

287 See, e.g., Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 702 (1979) (“[R]elief should be no more burdensome to the defendant than necessary to provide complete relief to the plaintiffs.”). The corollary to this proposition is that a suit becomes moot, and so a federal court loses jurisdiction, when relief would be ineffectual. See, e.g., Campbell-Ewald Co. v. Gomez, 136 S. Ct. 663, 669–71 (2016).

288 See, e.g., Teal v. Felton, 53 U.S. (12 How.) 284 (1851) (holding that state courts have jurisdiction in actions for trover against federal officials).

289 See generally id.

290 See Carlos M. Vázquez & Stephen I. Vladeck, State Law, the Westfall Act, and the Nature of the Bivens Question, 161 U. PENN. L. REV. 509, 535 (2013) (“The status of official immunity as federal or state law was unclear in the pre-Erie period. Today, the immunity is understood to have the status of federal common law, protecting federal officers whether sued under Bivens or state common law.”).

an Article about how to enforce federal law. Moreover, the Westfall Act excepts from its coverage suits “brought for a violation of the Constitution of the United States.”

It is even possible that state courts have more power than federal courts to recognize a right of action for damages against federal officials who allegedly violate the Constitution. To understand this counterintuitive proposition, recall that damages are available only if the relevant law provides a private right of action. In Bivens
v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, the Supreme Court created a private right of action to recover damages from federal officials who violate the Fourth Amendment. The Court reasoned that “[t]he very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury.” While such language might have been read to indicate that there is a private right of action for damages whenever any constitutional right is violated, the law has not evolved that way. Instead, the Court has cabin’d its holding in Bivens, refusing to create a damages action for most other violations. Yet it is not at all clear that state courts must be so stingy.

In Ziglar v. Abbasi, the Court set out its own reasons for cabining Bivens. It wrote that the primary question in determining whether a private right of action exists is “who should decide.” Because Congress is in the best position to decide whether, on balance, a damages right best balances private and government interests. While courts generally have the power to create rights of action, they should “hesitate” to do so in deference to Congress’s expertise. And “if there are sound reasons to think Congress might doubt the efficacy or necessity of a damages remedy . . . the courts must refrain from creating the remedy in order to respect the role of Congress in determining the nature and extent of federal-court jurisdiction under Article III.”

the scope of his employment in allegedly committing a state-law tort. Certification yields removal of the case to federal court, substitution of the federal government as defendant, and conversion of the suit from a state-law tort to one under the Federal Tort Claims Act. Id.

300 See id. at 397.
301 137 S. Ct. 1843 (2017).
303 See id. at 1857.
304 See generally id. at 1858 (discussing alternative remedial structures, including recognizing state tort law providing alternative means for relief).
305 137 S. Ct. 1843 (2017).
306 See id. at 1857.
According to Ziglar, there are prudential reasons to cabin Bivens, but the only thing that prevents the judicial recognition of rights of action for damages is Article III. While Congress may place some questions of federal law in the exclusive hands of federal courts, it does not have plenary power over state-court jurisdiction. State courts therefore need not worry about stepping on congressional power when deciding which remedies they make available to litigants before them.

One might also argue that the Supreme Court’s refusal to extend Bivens amounts to procedural federal law applicable in federal, but not state, court. If that were right, even if Ziglar rested on more than just Article III, its holding would be inapplicable to state courts. Under the Supremacy Clause, state courts must faithfully apply substantive federal law—including federal common law. But states are generally free to create their own procedural rules. Indeed, much state-court procedure differs from that of the federal courts. This arrangement is reminiscent of the Erie doctrine, under which federal courts sitting in diversity apply state substantive but not procedural law.

If the cases restricting Bivens are procedural, perhaps state courts need not abide by them. The question of whether cases creating—or declining to create—a remedy are substantive or procedural is knotty. Like Bivens, the Declaratory Judgment Act authorizes a remedy—namely the declaratory judgment. The Supreme Court has characterized the Declaratory Judgment Act as “only procedural . . . leaving substantive rights unchanged.” It makes sense to view Bivens the same way. But, by contrast, the Supreme Court treats punitive damages caps and statutes of limitation as substantive for purposes of the Erie doctrine. And both of those rules, like Bivens,

---

307 See id. at 1857.
308 See ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 617 (1989) (‘‘We have recognized often that the constraints of Article III do not apply to state courts, and accordingly the state courts are not bound by the limitations of a case or controversy or other federal rules of justiciability even when they address issues of federal law . . . .’’).
310 See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 617.
312 See Felder, 487 U.S. at 150–51.
313 See discussion infra Section III.B.
314 See Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938).
316 See 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a) (2012) (“Any such declaration shall have the force and effect of a final judgment or decree and shall be reviewable as such.”).
regulate how and how much litigants can recover in court. The precedent points in multiple directions.

Perhaps this uncertainty could be resolved by noting the different rationales at issue when federal courts wish to apply their own procedure and when state courts wish to apply theirs. The former situation is regulated by Erie, which aims to reduce forum shopping and promote the equitable administration of laws. The Erie doctrine also takes account of strong governmental interests, whether state or federal. The substance/procedure distinction under Erie is therefore shaped by such considerations. By contrast, states’ freedom to design their own procedural rules is regulated by the Supremacy Clause. It is subject to the constraint that such rules not impede the vindication of federal rights. So maybe Erie cases are inapposite in determining whether the states must follow the Supreme Court in limiting Bivens. Indeed, the Supreme Court has said that, by their procedures, “[s]tates may make the litigation of federal rights as congenial as they see fit.” The expansion of Bivens would not undermine federal rights; it would encourage their vindication. This, combined with the fact that the creation of a remedy regulates courts’—not ordinary citizens’—conduct, suggests that a state court’s expansion of Bivens might best be categorized as a legitimate procedural move.

Whatever the appeal of the foregoing arguments, we think it unlikely that the Supreme Court would uphold a state court’s decision to read Bivens liberally. The Court would likely have important policy considerations in mind, and those considerations would dovetail with well-established legal rules. Cases like Ziglar make the Court’s policy view clear: unless Congress has decided otherwise, damages awards against federal officers are suspect. As the Ziglar Court said, such potential liability imposes significant “burdens on Government employees who are sued personally, as . . . [on] the Government itself.”

The policy goal of ensuring that the federal government operates free from unwanted burdens carries legal weight. Since McCulloch v. Maryland, the Supreme Court has turned a skeptical eye toward states whose laws interfere with federal 319 See Gasperini, 518 U.S. at 426.

---

320 See id. at 428.
321 See id. at 427 n.7, 431–32.
322 See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.
324 Id. at 151.
325 Careful readers may object that vindicating federal rights entails optimal rather than maximal enforcement. The objection is sound, but its purchase depends on whether we’re near optimal enforcement of any particular right. If only for the sake of argument, we presume some federal rights are less than optimally enforced.
326 See, e.g., Felder, 487 U.S. at 139–40, 147.
328 Id. at 1858.
entities. There, the Court wielded the Supremacy Clause to strike down a Maryland law taxing the national bank. The Court reasoned that “the power to tax involves the power to destroy,” and a state had no right to destroy an entity duly created by federal powers. This reasoning hews closely to the Ziglar Court’s account of its own inability to read Bivens broadly; its doing so would be too burdensome to the federal government and its officers, at least as far as Congress was concerned. The Ziglar Court saw Article III implications in these facts. But we might instead anticipate Supremacy Clause problems of the variety explored in McCulloch, should a state judiciary decide to read Bivens liberally. The power to award damages may not involve the power to destroy, but it certainly involves the power to annoy. And if the burden of damages goes significantly beyond annoyance, we should expect state lawmakers—including courts exercising their common-law powers—to be forbidden to authorize such actions unilaterally.

So Bivens remedies are unlikely to be more readily available in state than federal court. But this is no strike against litigation in state court. It just means that, as far as damages are concerned, state courts are no better for plaintiffs than their federal siblings. But they are also no worse. The damages remedy is most likely available in state courts to the same extent it is available in federal court.

2. Injunctions

Injunctions are typically available in state courts for plaintiffs who prevail on the merits of a claim while demonstrating that remedies at law are inadequate and the public interest favors such relief. Apart from its substantive terms, the scope of any injunction is a function of its duration and geography.

Like federal courts, state courts may issue short-term injunctions (usually called temporary restraining orders), preliminary injunctions (to preserve the status quo pending litigation), and permanent injunctions (as final relief). Also like federal courts, state courts occasionally issue nationwide injunctions—those that regulate the defendant’s conduct vis-à-vis the plaintiff throughout the country. For example, an Illinois court might impose a nationwide ban on a businessman working for his former employer’s competitors, or an Ohio court might impose a nationwide ban on three musicians putting on a performance too similar to that of another group. Implicit in these cases is a fundamental principle: a state court may require someone to do or refrain from doing something even outside the court’s territorial jurisdiction so long as there exists personal jurisdiction.344

An especially coveted remedy for some impact litigators suing in federal court is the national injunction. As distinguished from the nationwide injunction, the national injunction regulates a defendant’s conduct with respect to everyone, even non-parties. For example, plaintiffs have obtained national injunctions from federal courts that barred the Obama and Trump Administrations from executing their immigration policies in favor of, and against, anyone. A burgeoning literature considers the propriety of federal courts issuing such relief. Much of this literature is skeptical. Yet much of this skepticism is grounded in Article III considerations, and Article III considerations of course drop out if a state court is doing the enjoining. Thus, counterintuitively, state courts may have a more authentic claim to power to issue national injunctions than do federal courts. Indeed, in states where plaintiffs 340 See Understanding Injunctions, supra note 337.

343 See Cesare, 520 N.E.2d at 596–97.
346 On the distinction, see, e.g., Samuel L. Bray, Multiple Chancellors: Reforming the National Injunction, 131 HARV. L. REV. 417, 418–19, 419 n.4 (2017).
347 See Texas v. United States, 809 F.3d 134 (5th Cir. 2015), aff’d by an equally divided court, 136 S. Ct. 2271 (2016).
348 See Hawaii v. Trump, 859 F.3d 741 (9th Cir. 2017), vacated & dismissed as moot, 874 F.3d 1112 (9th Cir. 2017) (mem.).
350 See, e.g., Bray, supra note 346, at 419; Morley, supra note 349, at 494.
351 Morley, for example, argues that individual plaintiffs generally lack Article III standing to secure injunctions barring the government from enforcing a law against third parties (what Morley calls a “Defendant-Oriented Injunction”). See Morley, supra note 349, at 523–27.
352 See, e.g., ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 617 (1989) (recognizing “that the constraints of Article III do not apply to state courts”).
are not required to demonstrate a concrete and particularized injury to sue, it is difficult to imagine what an injunction would look like if not an order regulating a defendant’s conduct generally.

A more complicated and consequential issue is whether state courts can enjoin federal officials based on federal law. As a positive matter, nobody knows for sure. The Supreme Court has dodged the question. In the face of this uncertainty, we pick up where others have left off and argue from first principles that state courts should be understood to possess such power. More specifically, we argue that state courts should be understood to possess such power inherently and as an implication of the Supremacy Clause.

Start with the argument for an inherent power. Article III, § 1 of the U.S. Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested “in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.” This embodies the Madisonian Compromise, in which the Framers agreed that Congress would retain discretion to establish lower federal courts. If lower federal courts need not exist as a constitutional matter, then we ought to think the Framers understood state courts and state-court remedies to be adequate for enforcing federal law against federal officials. Of course, the First Congress exercised its discretion to create a system of lower federal courts. But that innovation did not detract from the original power of the state courts. To the contrary, when the First Congress passed the Judiciary Act of 1789, it chose to withhold from the lower federal courts the general grant of federal-question jurisdiction we now have in 28 U.S.C. § 1331. Suits under federal law against federal officers were to commence in state courts except in cases of diversity. It may seem

---

353 See discussion supra Section I.B.
354 Richard Fallon has described this as “one of the most fascinatingly arcane debates in the law and theory of federal courts.” Richard H. Fallon, Jr., The Ideologies of Federal Courts Law, 74 VA. L. REV. 1141, 1202 & n.282 (1988).
355 See id. at 1202–07, 1202 n.282.
356 See Brooks v. Dewar, 313 U.S. 354, 359–60 (1941) (declining to answer this question of “grave consequence”).
358 See U.S. CONST. art. VI, cl. 2.
359 U.S. CONST. art. III, § 1.
360 FALLON ET AL., supra note 72, at 6–8.
361 Act of Sept. 24, 1789, ch. 20, 1 Stat. 73.
362 See FALLON ET AL., supra note 72, at 24 (discussing the First Judiciary Act’s origination of removal to federal courts as contingent on meeting a minimum amount in controversy and identifying as an out-of-state defendant).
363 1 Stat. 73.
364 FALLON ET AL., supra note 72, at 22, 25.
bewildering to modern minds that the Framers put so much faith in the state judiciaries. To the Framers themselves, it was natural that they should.

The Supremacy Clause likewise implies an inherent power of state courts to enjoin federal officials based on federal law. To be sure, we are not contending that the Supremacy Clause creates a cause of action for injunctive relief—the Supreme Court rejected that argument in Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Care Center, Inc. Our contention is instead that the Supremacy Clause presupposes a cause of action for injunctive relief—a view consistent with Justice Scalia’s opinion for the Court in Armstrong—and also the requisite authority to enjoin.

Embedded within the Supremacy Clause are two directives. First is that “[t]his Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof . . . shall be the supreme Law of the Land.” Second is that “the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.” Splitting the text this way makes clear that it singles out only state judges, commanding them to give unsparing effect to the Constitution and federal law. Such a command apparently presupposes authority to order compliance with federal law. And an exception to that authority in cases

See, e.g., The Federalist No. 27 (Alexander Hamilton) (“[T]he laws of the Confederacy . . . will become the supreme law of the land; to the observance of which all officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, in each State, will be bound by the sanctity of an oath. Thus the legislatures, courts, and magistrates, of the respective members, will be incorporated into the operations of the national government as far as its just and constitutional authority extends; and will be rendered auxiliary to the enforcement of its laws.”); The Federalist No. 82 (Alexander Hamilton) (“The judiciary power of every government looks beyond its own local or municipal laws, and in civil cases lays hold of all subjects of litigation between parties within its jurisdiction, though the causes of dispute are relative to the laws of the most distant part of the globe. . . . When in addition to this we consider the State governments and the national governments, as they truly are, in the light of kindred systems, and as parts of one whole, the inference seems to be conclusive, that the State courts would have a concurrent jurisdiction in all cases arising under the laws of the Union, where it was not expressly prohibited.”).

Cf. Arnold, supra note 357, at 1401.

Id. (“What our cases demonstrate is that, in a proper case, relief may be given in a court of equity . . . to prevent an injurious act by a public officer. The ability to sue to enjoin unconstitutional actions by state and federal officers is the creation of courts of equity, and reflects a long history of judicial review of illegal executive action, tracing back to England.” (internal citations and quotation marks omitted)).

See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

Id.

Id.

There is an extensive scholarly debate about why the Supremacy Clause singles out state judges. See Caleb Nelson, Preemption, 86 Va. L. Rev. 225, 245 n.60 (2000) (noting the competing views).

The Supreme Court has made a similar point with respect to federal courts and state officials. See New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 179 (1992) (“[T]he Supremacy against federal officials would make little sense in a system that trusts state courts to hear cases arising under federal law.

Skeptics of state courts’ authority to enjoin federal officials cite nineteenth-century decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court that deny state courts’ authority to issue writs of mandamus and habeas corpus directed at federal officials.\(^\text{375}\) For example, in McClung v. Stilliman,\(^\text{376}\) the Justices held that a state court lacked jurisdiction over a suit for mandamus that would have compelled a federal officer to convey real property.\(^\text{377}\) In Tarble’s Case,\(^\text{378}\) the Justices held that a state court lacked jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus that would have effectively compelled an officer of the United States Army to release an enlistee who had deserted.\(^\text{379}\) The opinions in these cases deploy vaguely constitutional reasoning and are rooted in the notion that a federal official “can only be controlled by the power that created him.”\(^\text{380}\) Yet nineteenth-century decisions affirm the power of state courts to order specific relief in actions at law against federal officials.\(^\text{381}\) For example, in Slocum v. Mayberry,\(^\text{382}\) Chief Justice Marshall affirmed a state court’s order of replevin against a federal customs official.\(^\text{383}\) In Stanley v. Schwalby,\(^\text{384}\) the Justices reversed a state court that had concluded it was without jurisdiction to order ejectment against officers of the United States Army.\(^\text{385}\) Tension between these contrasting lines of precedent is apparent: the difference between an injunction, on one hand, and replevin or ejectment, on the other, is of form rather than substance.\(^\text{386}\)

Perhaps any deep objection to the thought of state courts enjoining federal officials stems from an intuition that the power to enjoin is the power to destroy. More than an intuition, really, this is a takeoff on Chief Justice Marshall’s reasoning in McCulloch v. Maryland.\(^\text{387}\) We agree that uneasiness sets in when one thinks about the possibility

\(^{376}\) 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 598 (1821).

\(^{377}\) See id. at 603–05. Oddly, the Supreme Court purported to affirm the state court’s judgment on the merits after deciding that the state court had been without jurisdiction. See id.

\(^{378}\) 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 397 (1872).

\(^{379}\) See id. at 411–12.

\(^{382}\) 15 U.S. (2 Wheat.) 1 (1817).

\(^{383}\) See id. at 12–13.

\(^{384}\) 147 U.S. 508 (1893).

\(^{385}\) See id. at 520.

\(^{386}\) See Arnold, supra note 357, at 1394–95.

\(^{387}\) See 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 327 (1819). of a state judge taking charge of the commanding heights of the federal government through injunctions. But that unease seems to reflect priors about how federalism should work rather than any legal doctrine. As discussed above, McCulloch was about a state interfering with a federal instrumentality through the application of state law.388 Nothing in Chief Justice Marshall’s opinion compels the conclusion that state judges must refrain from enjoining federal officials to obey federal law.389 Indeed, far from the power to destroy, the power to enjoin federal officials to obey federal law should be understood as the power to preserve a federal government of laws and not men.

3. Declaratory Judgments

Declaratory relief is widely available in state court.390 As of this writing, forty states have adopted the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act,391 which resembles the federal statute.392 The remaining ten states have enacted different statutes that authorize declaratory relief in many cases.393

Declaratory relief is noncoercive: It does not by itself impose legal obligations on a party as does an award of damages or injunction.394 One might therefore conclude that state courts can award declaratory relief in an action against a federal official even if it seems doubtful that state courts may award damages or injunctive relief against that same federal official.395 Yet jurisdiction to award declaratory relief is usually tied up with jurisdiction to award coercive relief,396 and state courts generally heed a presumption that public officials will follow the law as it is announced in a declaratory judgment.397 So it may be that state courts’ power to award declaratory

---

388 Id. at 319 (“The question submitted to the Court for their decision in this case, is as to the validity of the said act of the General Assembly of Maryland, on the ground of its being repugnant to the constitution of the United States, and the act of Congress aforesaid, or to one of them.”).
389 See generally id.
393 See, e.g., CAL. CIV. PROC. CODE § 1060 (West 2018); N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 3001 (McKinney 2018).
395 Cf. id.
relief in an action against a federal official depends on their power to enjoin that same federal official, the thorny issue we evaluated above. 398

B. Are State-Court Procedures Burdensome?

Litigants also might rationally prefer to litigate in federal court and risk dismissal for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction if state courts impose unique procedural hurdles. Even if these hurdles are surmountable, the relative difficulty of litigating a case to judgment could be enough to push a cost-conscious or time-sensitive plaintiff into federal court. And even if the marginal costs are low and time plentiful, procedure matters because it often bleeds into substance. This is a highly context-specific inquiry, of course, and here we only sketch some considerations.

Start with a procedural issue related closely to the discussion of remedies. Law and equity merged in the federal system with the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938. 399 Until then, a litigant seeking equitable relief in federal court had to adhere to the Federal Equity Rules; 400 a litigant seeking damages in federal court had to adhere to the forum state’s practice, typically rooted in either the common law or Field Code; 401 and a litigant seeking equitable relief and damages had to navigate both. 402 Merger yielded a single action in the federal system—the “civil action” 403 —and brought with it simplicity and convenience. 404

So might the complication from the residual separation of law and equity in states’ systems push plaintiffs into federal court? We doubt it. Only three states—Delaware, Mississippi, and Tennessee—formally retain separate courts of law and equity. 405 New Jersey and Cook County, Illinois—home of Chicago—maintain separate divisions of law and equity within the same court. 406 And Georgia distinguishes law and equity

---

398 See supra notes 282–397 and accompanying text.
400 See Wallace R. Lane, Twenty Years Under the Federal Equity Rules, 46 HARV. L. REV. 638, 638 (1933).
401 This was a consequence of The Conformity Act, which required that the procedure in the federal district courts conform “as near as may be” with that of the forum state’s trial courts. See Act of June 1, 1872, ch. 255, §§ 5–6, 17 Stat. 196, 197.
402 See id. (applying the forum state’s rules of procedure to actions at law); see also Lane, supra note 400, at 638 (discussing how Federal Equity Rules governed a suit in equity).
403 FED. R. CIV. P. 2 (“There is one form of action—the civil action.”).
404 See, e.g., WRIGHT ET AL., supra note 399, § 1004.
406 See id. at 538 & n.32 (citing ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. S. CT. R. 135 (West 2009 & Supp.
Another consideration is the rules of discovery and evidence that apply in state courts. This could be especially important to litigants who require a smoking gun to survive a motion to dismiss, or expert testimony to meet their burden of proof on a theory of causation. Of course, in federal court, federal rules apply. Discovery is governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Expert testimony is governed by the Federal Rules of Evidence, especially Federal Rule of Evidence 702 and the Supreme Court’s decision in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. Litigants can take advantage of a body of precedent and academic work fleshing out the positive and normative aspects of these regimes.

So might the relative uncertainty from litigating under a state’s rules of discovery and evidence push plaintiffs into federal court? Again, we doubt it. Start with discovery. The federal rules are more uniform in aspiration than practice, a result of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 83, which gives district courts authority to promulgate local rules. Nearly all district courts have invoked that authority, and commentators have reflected on the variety that has resulted. As for evidence, many claims present straightforward legal questions. Even claims that do rise and fall on, say, the admissibility of an expert’s testimony are likely to meet the same fate in federal and state court: thirty-two states have adopted rules mimicking Federal Rule of Evidence 702 and Daubert. We do not deny that litigating in state court means doing your homework on that state’s rules of discovery and evidence. For litigators used to proceeding in federal court, that extra homework may matter on the margin. But again, we suspect that the impact here is de minimis.
A final consideration is the right to a jury trial.419 This is a constitutional entitlement of litigants in federal court who seek damages.420 And it is one of the few entitlements set out in the Bill of Rights that has not been incorporated against the states.421 The upshot is that a state is under no obligation to afford juries in civil actions unless that state’s constitution or other rules require, or the action is to enforce a federal right of which the jury trial is an indispensable part.422 These caveats are big—most states have constitutional provisions that mirror the Seventh Amendment,423 and we imagine that many litigants who seek to enforce federal law in state court, and who seek damages, will be invoking a federal right that carries with it a jury trial. Accordingly, there would be no disadvantage to litigating in state court along this dimension.

C. Have Litigators Succumbed to Irrational Biases?

The previous sections posited rational explanations for why impact litigators have not exploited the Federal–State Standing Gap. Those explanations are inadequate. Neither limitations on remedies nor procedural hurdles give litigants good reason to struggle for standing in federal court rather than turning to the states.424 That leaves irrational explanations. We posit two. First, a weak form of path dependence may steer impact litigators toward federal, rather than state, court. Second, since many impact litigators were educated at top law schools, clerked for federal judges, and have spent most of their careers litigating in federal court, they may simply be too snobbish to consider state-court litigation a live possibility.

The kind of path dependence we have in mind is not one that ought rationally keep litigators from filing in state court and potentially using ASARCO’s path to federal review. It does not, for example, arise from a feedback effect via which the federal courts became over time the rational venue for impact litigation. Rather, we propose that impact litigators have been operating on autopilot, enacting a civil-rights-era preference for federal litigation that no longer makes sense.

419 See Bray, supra note 405, at 539, 542–43.
420 See U.S. CONST. amend. VII (“In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved . . . .”).
421 See Olesen v. Trust Co. of Chi., 245 F.2d 522 (7th Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 896 (1957); see also Nat’l Rifle Ass’n of Am. v. City of Chicago, 567 F.3d 856, 858 (7th Cir. 2009), rev’d and remanded on other grounds sub nom. McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (2010).
424 See discussion supra Sections III.A–B.
For civil rights impact litigators in the mid-twentieth century, federal courts were almost certainly the right venue for litigation. They were so unwilling to enforce federal civil rights laws that some scholars have characterized them as “eschew[ing] the rule of law.”

State courts became so involved in enforcing Jim Crow laws that the Supreme Court eventually ruled that state-court enforcement of private racial covenants could constitute state action and violate Equal Protection. Clearly, for mid-century impact litigators hoping to leverage federal law to fight racial inequality, state courts were the wrong place to be.

Civil rights litigators learned their lesson. They turned to the federal courts to enforce federal law and won historic victories. But perhaps they learned the lesson too well. Maybe impact litigators working outside the area of civil rights and the era of Jim Crow continue to assume that state courts will be reluctant to enforce federal law. It is difficult to see why that should be right. State courts in the Jim Crow era were not necessarily averse to enforcing all federal law; their objection was primarily to laws fighting racial discrimination. So for litigants interested in enforcing the Establishment Clause or the Emoluments Clause, there may never have been any reason to think state court an inferior venue.

Recent events have proved that some states—at least their executive officials—are now as eager as anyone to enforce federal law. The lead litigants bringing challenges to the Trump administration’s policies have been states. Hawaii and Washington led the charge in challenging Trump’s travel ban as violating the Establishment Clause and Due Process Clause. And, apparently in hopes that it would avoid the standing challenges faced by CREW, Maryland has sued Trump for allegedly violating the Emoluments Clause. Ironically, even though Maryland’s standing

---

426 See id. at 507.

427 See id. at 507 & nn.4–5 (collecting scholarship).

429 See Godsil, supra note 425, at 507.

431 See Godsil, supra note 425, at 533 (discussing how many southern state judges believed in a legal theory that enabled them to not enforce federal laws, but for non-racial reasons).

433 See id.

434 See id.

is a matter of some debate, it seems to have written off its own courts as potential enforcers of the Constitution; it filed suit in federal court.

This brings us to our second theory of irrational avoidance of the state courts. Perhaps impact litigators are not laboring under the misguided civil-rights-era assumption that state courts will not enforce federal law. Maybe they instead regard state courts as comparatively incompetent.

State courts are much maligned by law professors, federal legislators, and the defense bar. Note that these elite lawyers are among the least likely to have significant experience litigating in state court. Some such individuals regard the state courts as “‘biased,’ ‘hostile,’ ‘discriminatory,’ ‘incompetent,’ ‘unprincipled,’ and ‘out-of-control’.” Many states elect their judges, and elected judges are sometimes viewed as less skillful and more corrupt than their appointed-for-life brethren. These views are dubious. But whether they are right or wrong is, to an extent, irrelevant. As we have discussed at length, impact litigators facing standing hurdles do not have a choice between federal and state court. Because their plaintiffs have no federal standing—and, given the nature of their challenge, no one may have it—their choice is state court or nothing. And until now, they have often chosen nothing. Surely no matter how much worse state court is than federal court, it is unreasonable to give up rather than litigate there.

We do not mean to suggest that impact litigators are aware of ASARCO’s no-standing path to the Supreme Court but consciously prefer no enforcement to state-court litigation. Rather we suppose that the kinds of people who become active impact litigators have failed to seriously consider state court as a venue for litigation. Such people have little experience in state court and tend to regard it with fear or derision. And if no one is thinking about state-court litigation, no one will notice that ASARCO provides a path from state court to the Supreme Court, plaintiff’s standing be damned.

436 See id.
437 See id.
439 Id. at 425.
441 See Rice, supra note 438, at 508–68 (studying state-court class actions to challenge the idea that state courts have less skill and more prejudice).
442 See discussion supra Part I.
443 See discussion supra Part I.
444 See discussion supra Part I.
445 See supra notes 438–40 and accompanying text.
IV. WHAT SHOULD WE THINK OF THE ASARCO RULE?

A. Is ASARCO Right as a Matter of Law?

ASARCO’s result is unexpected.\textsuperscript{446} It allows plaintiffs who would otherwise be constitutionally barred from litigating in federal court to have their claims adjudicated by the U.S. Supreme Court.\textsuperscript{447} As we describe, this subverts Article III, creating a path by which no-standing litigants can avoid its requirements and obtain federal review.\textsuperscript{448} Given this, one might wonder if ASARCO is good law.

The dissenters did not think so.\textsuperscript{449} Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justice Scalia, raised two major objections to the majority’s ruling.\textsuperscript{450} First, Article III required the plaintiffs-respondents, rather than the defendants-petitioners, to show a cognizable injury.\textsuperscript{451} Second, even if the defendants-petitioners’ standing was what mattered, a state-court judgment against them is not an injury independently giving rise to an Article III “case” or “controversy.”\textsuperscript{452}

The idea that a defendant’s stake in a case might be sufficient for Article III standing is unique to the ASARCO ruling.\textsuperscript{453} The majority ostensibly focused on the defendants-petitioners’ standing because they were the ones first invoking the power of the federal courts.\textsuperscript{454} But as the dissent noted, while other cases hold that a defendant’s continuing interest might be necessary for federal review, no case holds that it is sufficient.\textsuperscript{455}

\textsuperscript{446} We are neither the first to notice nor the first to critique. See, e.g., William A. Fletcher, The “Case or Controversy” Requirement in State Court Adjudication of Federal Questions, 78 CALIF. L. REV. 263, 264–65 (1990); Calvin Massey, Standing in State Courts, State Law, and Federal Review, 53 DUQ. L. REV. 401, 404–05 (2015); Robert J. Pushaw, Jr., Bridging the Enforcement Gap in Constitutional Law: A Critique of the Supreme Court’s Theory that Self-Restraint Promotes Federalism, 46 WM. & MARY L. REV. 1289, 1298–99 (2005). But we are the first to explicate the opportunities ASARCO affords no-standing plaintiffs and reflect on why plaintiffs seem not to have taken full advantage. See discussion supra Section II.A, Part III.

\textsuperscript{447} See Massey, supra note 446, at 404–05.

\textsuperscript{448} See discussion supra Section II.A.

\textsuperscript{450} See id.

\textsuperscript{451} See id. at 634–35.

\textsuperscript{452} See id. at 635–37.

\textsuperscript{453} See Pushaw, supra note 446, at 1298–99.

\textsuperscript{454} See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 635 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{455} See id. Note that Hollingsworth v. Perry, 570 U.S. 693 (2013), can be read as comporting with this view. There, a federal district court held that California’s ban on gay marriage was unconstitutional. Id. at 698–701. California declined to appeal. The Supreme Court held that because no other putative defendant (or perhaps more accurately, no other appellant) had a real stake in the case, there was no Article III case or controversy; it dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Id. at 700–01. The absence of a defendant (appellant) with a real interest in the case was fatal for federal review. Id. But nothing in Hollingsworth implies that, in the Furthermore, in contexts other than a petition for certiorari from a state court, the federal courts focus on the plaintiff’s, not the defendant’s, standing. This is true regardless of which party first invokes the power of the federal courts. Defendants may remove a case from state court to federal court under 28 U.S.C. § 1441, thereby initiating federal review. Such defendants risk the same kind of injury incurred by the ASARCO defendants—a judgment against them. But contrary to ASARCO, it is the plaintiff’s standing, not the defendants, that matters in removal. The Supreme Court has held that, when plaintiffs lack standing, the federal courts have no jurisdiction to hear a removed case.

The same is true when a party who would otherwise be a defendant in a suit for damages or an injunction brings an action for declaratory relief in federal court. Under the ASARCO rule, the declaratory plaintiff is the party first invoking the power of the federal courts. We should therefore expect its standing to be sufficient. But when a party bringing an action for declaratory relief is functionally a defendant—when it is merely suing to preemptively trigger a lawsuit in which it would face damages or an injunction against it—the declaratory plaintiff’s potential injury counts for nothing.

The Supreme Court has consistently held that, in such declaratory cases, it is the functional plaintiff, not the formal declaratory plaintiff, who matters for jurisdictional purposes. “[T]he Declaratory Judgment Act merely expands the remedies available in the district courts without expanding their jurisdiction.” Federal courts evaluating jurisdiction in declaratory actions must therefore imagine the hypothetical action for absence of a plaintiff with a real stake in the case, the defendant’s (appellant’s) stake would have been sufficient. See id. at 697–715.

456 See, e.g., DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 352 (2006) (“[A] plaintiff must demonstrate standing for each claim he seeks to press.” (citation omitted)).
457 See id.
459 See supra notes 200–13 and accompanying text.
461 See, e.g., Franchise Tax Bd. of Cal. v. Constr. Laborers Vacation Tr. for S. Cal., 463 U.S. 1, 18–19 (1983) (“[F]ederal courts do not have original jurisdiction, nor do they acquire jurisdiction on removal, where a federal question is presented by a complaint for a state declaratory judgment . . . .”).
464 See Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. at 19.
465 See id.
damages or an injunction that could arise between the parties. They then determine whether they would have jurisdiction over that case.

For federal-question jurisdiction, “if, but for the availability of the declaratory judgment procedure, the federal claim would arise only as a defense to a state created action, jurisdiction is lacking.” Thus, when a declaratory plaintiff asks for a declaration of federal right that would otherwise arise only as a defense to a state-law suit against it, there is no jurisdiction. It is insufficient that the declaratory plaintiff raises a federal question in its petition for the court to determine its rights. In other words, despite the fact that the declaratory plaintiff is, under ASARCO, the party first seeking federal review, its presentation of the case cannot establish jurisdiction.

The same logic applies to evaluating standing—rather than the presence of a federal question—in declaratory actions. Like the federal-question rule, Article III’s case-or-controversy requirement is jurisdictional. If the Declaratory Judgment Act did not expand the federal courts’ jurisdiction to hear federal questions, it also did not expand jurisdiction along the case-or-controversy axis. Before hearing a declaratory case, then, federal courts must determine whether there would be standing in the related hypothetical coercive action. And in such a hypothetical action, the plaintiff’s standing—not the defendant’s alone—would be a necessary condition on jurisdiction.

The ASARCO rule thus is inapplicable in the two other situations where a functional defendant initiates federal review. A defendant attempting to remove to federal court cannot invoke its own standing to support jurisdiction. Nor can a party who would otherwise be a defendant in state court present his own injury to a federal court as a plaintiff in a declaratory action. The ASARCO majority’s rule is not only novel, it is in tension with the weight of federal standing doctrine.

---

469 See Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. at 19.
470 Id.
471 Id. at 16 (citation omitted).
472 See, e.g., Pub. Serv. Comm’n of Utah v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 241–42 (1952); Ne. Ill. Reg’l Commuter R.R. Corp. v. Hoey Farina & Downes, 212 F.3d 1010, 1014 (7th Cir. 2000) (“[If the plaintiff cannot get into federal court by anticipating what amounts to a federal defense to a state-law cause of action, he also should not be able to use the Declaratory Judgment Act to do so by asserting what is really a preemptive federal defense as the basis of his complaint.”).
474 It is actually more fundamental than the federal-question inquiry. The latter comes from 28 U.S.C. § 1331, which is understood to be narrower than Article III, § 2. Standing in federal court is a constitutional requirement. See discussion supra Section I.A.
475 See Franchise Tax Bd., 463 U.S. at 19.
476 See id.
477 See id.
478 See id. at 18–19.
479 See id.
One can understand the general practice of focusing on plaintiffs’, rather than defendants’, standing by zooming out from standing’s narrow criteria and examining Article III more broadly. The case-or-controversy requirement seeks, among other things,481 adjudication of legal issues only when both parties have real skin in the game.482 This prevents courts from deciding the law’s meaning “in the rarified atmosphere of a debating society.”483 Standing is just one of the formal lenses for thinking about that goal. Other Article III doctrines like mootness484 and ripeness485 also police the requirement that both “parties maintain an ‘actual’ and ‘concrete’ interest” in the litigation.486

A defendant facing damages or an injunction certainly has skin in the game; the potential judgment against him is his motivation. But that will more or less always be the case. And under Article III’s case-or-controversy requirement, it takes two to tango; the point is ensuring that both parties will adequately argue the case.487 Merely noting that a judgment against the defendant will harm the defendant does not do the trick.488 We also need to know whether the other party—the plaintiff—has a serious interest.489

So a defendant facing a coercive judgment might be sensibly characterized, following the ASARCO majority, as having a redressable, traceable injury.490 But that’s almost never the injury that matters. It can generally be assumed, and courts therefore usually turn immediately to the plaintiff’s injury to ensure that both parties are in the case to win.491 Courts focus on the plaintiff’s standing because it is usually the factor in doubt.492 If a defendant’s commitment to the litigation happens to be in doubt, courts should also investigate it and, if it is found wanting, dismiss for lack of jurisdiction.493 Our examination of non-ASARCO standing doctrine suggests the following

---

481 Standing doctrine also works to preserve the Executive’s constitutional prerogative to enforce federal law. See supra note 24 and accompanying text.

483 Id.

487 See Valley Forge, 454 U.S. at 472.

488 See id. (holding that as “the party who invokes the court’s authority,” the plaintiff must show he is injured).

489 See id.

490 See ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 619 (1989) (finding that ASARCO, the defendant-petitioner, suffered an injury that a favorable judgment would redress).

491 See, e.g., Valley Forge, 454 U.S. at 472.

492 See id. (suggesting that a plaintiff’s injury is an effective way to filter out abstract and generalized cases).

493 See discussion supra note 455.
rule: it is always necessary under Article III that an adverse decision will injure either the plaintiff or the defendant, but only the prospect of injury to both is sufficient.

This insight allows us to quickly understand the ASARCO dissent’s second point—that a judgment against a defendant is not a sufficient injury to support jurisdiction. The majority was right that the judgment against the defendant ensured that it was invested in the case. But it was clear that the plaintiffs were never threatened with physical harm, monetary loss, or any other traditionally cognizable but intangible injury. From the outset, they would have failed the standing test—one of several doctrines policing the case-or-controversy requirement. And, the dissent thought, since both parties’ investment is a condition on any federal court’s jurisdiction, the Supreme Court lacked power to hear the case.

B. Is ASARCO Right as a Matter of Policy?

If, as suggested above, ASARCO’s legal foundation is shaky, why did the Supreme Court decide as it did? One might suspect it had policy in mind. The legal puzzle of ASARCO is complex, turning on who must be injured and how to present a case or controversy under Article III. The policy dilemma is simple. ASARCO asked whether some state-court decisions interpreting federal law are beyond the review of any federal court. The Supreme Court’s answer: no. In so answering, the Court reserved to itself the power to conclusively interpret federal law.

This policy dilemma did not go unnoticed in the ASARCO opinions. The dissent thought it was “unremarkable” that state courts might “remain free to decide important questions of federal statutory and constitutional law without the possibility of review in this Court.” Even if no-standing state-court cases were unreviewable, the dissent saw “no reason to fear that” the Court would be denied its “opportunity to review many important decisions on questions of federal law.”

The dissent was wrong. There are two ways in which our legal landscape sans the ASARCO rule would be remarkable. First, contrary to the dissent’s position, there

---

494 See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 634–35 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
495 See id. at 634.
496 See id.
497 See id. at 616–17 (plurality opinion).
498 See id. at 634 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
499 See id. at 612 (plurality opinion).
500 See id. at 617.
501 See id. at 618–19 (majority opinion) (finding jurisdiction to review the Arizona Supreme Court’s interpretation of the federal New Mexico–Arizona Enabling Act of 1910).
502 See id.
503 Id. at 636 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
504 Id. at 636–37.
505 Pushaw develops similar arguments on his way to calling for the Court to restructure would indeed be important questions of federal law that the Supreme Court would have no opportunity to review. In such areas, state judiciaries who disagreed with the Supreme Court’s interpretation of federal law could defy the Court’s holdings. Second, even if state courts did their best to interpret federal law, they might often disagree. In areas of law where standing is rare, this could lead to the permanent fragmentation of federal law across state jurisdictions.

1. The ASARCO Rule Prevents State Courts from Openly Defying the Supreme Court

A world without ASARCO might be quite remarkable. Standing doctrine prevents many suits in federal court. But as we’ve illustrated, many of those suits could be brought in state court. Suppose plaintiffs without standing begin to take advantage of the Federal–State Standing Gap, litigating their federal claims in state courts. With ASARCO, the Supreme Court has a chance to weigh in, reversing state courts that get federal law wrong. Without ASARCO, there is no federal review of any case where the plaintiffs lacked standing.

This result—that the state courts issue unreviewable judgments based on federal law—is perhaps strange. But is it worrisome? Maybe, if one expects state courts to decide questions of federal law incorrectly. They might sometimes decide incorrectly by accident. But an occasional state-court error in interpreting the law is no serious cause for concern. The Supreme Court will generally get the chance to issue guidance, and the misstep can be corrected.

But state courts might also decide federal claims incorrectly on purpose. It is no secret that states already bend federal law to serve their own, often partisan, purposes. In Texas v. United States, conservative Texan officials leveraged the Administrative Procedure Act and the Take Care Clause to oppose President Obama’s immigration policies. In Hollingsworth v. Perry, liberal officials from California declined to See Pushaw, supra note 446, at 1295–1300, 1341.

See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 636–37 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

See id. at 636.

See discussion infra Section IV.B.1.

See, e.g., ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 612–13 (plurality opinion).

See discussion supra Part I.

See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 623–24.

See id. at 618, 623–24.

See id. at 623–24.

787 F.3d 733 (5th Cir. 2015).

See Adam Liptak & Michael D. Shear, Supreme Court to Hear Challenge to Obama Immigration Actions, N.Y. TIMES (Jan. 19, 2016), https://nyti.ms/2jYm6O. Ken Paxton, a Republican, was Attorney General of Texas at the time; he remains in that position as of this writing.

challenge a circuit court’s opinion that the state’s same-sex marriage ban violated the Fourteenth Amendment.517 In doing so, they essentially adopted their preferred reading of federal law and denied the Supreme Court the opportunity to contradict them.518

State executive officials are not the only ones known to play politics. The California Supreme Court has been locked in a battle with the U.S. Supreme Court for years about the validity of arbitration agreements.519 Justices of the California Supreme Court, apparently sympathizing with consumers who sign such agreements, have read the Federal Arbitration Act so inconsistently with U.S. Supreme Court precedent that they have been said to be “dancing on their own.”520 Meanwhile, former Chief Justice Roy Moore of the Alabama Supreme Court resigned from his position last year521 after being charged with ethics violations for ordering probate judges to ignore the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Obergefell v. Hodges.522 Upon resigning, Moore defended himself as having stood up for “the people of Alabama . . . the Constitution . . . [and] God.”523 These are just recent, salient examples: plenty of others exist if one reaches back to the Civil Rights Era.524

States, acting through their officials and judges, have different interests than the federal government, and they are willing to interpret federal law to serve those interests.525 In some cases, they are willing to go so far as to openly defy the directives of the U.S. Supreme Court.526 Without the ASARCO rule, no federal court could correct a state court’s defiance in any case without Article III standing.

517 See Maura Dolan & Carol J. Williams, Jerry Brown Again Says Prop. 8 Should Be Struck Down, L.A. TIMES (June 13, 2009), http://articles.latimes.com/2009/jun/13/local/me-gay-marriage13 [https://perma.cc/4ZMP-HU58]. Jerry Brown, a Democrat, was Attorney General of California at the time; he is Governor of California as of this writing.
518 See Hollingsworth, 570 U.S. at 702–03.
520 Id.
521 Id.
523 135 S. Ct. 2584 (2015) (holding that the Due Process Clause and Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment together guarantee a right to same-sex marriage).
525 See supra notes 514–24 and accompanying text.
526 See Cason, supra note 521.
Savvy state judiciaries and litigants could, if they wished, take advantage of this fact. If, for example, the Ohio state judiciary disagreed with the Supreme Court about who counts as a debt collector under federal law, it could telegraph its view to interest groups. Those interest groups could then furnish a plaintiff—or class of plaintiffs—able to sue in state, but not federal, court. The state court could rule in the plaintiff’s favor, ignoring the Supreme Court’s understanding of federal law, and no one could do anything about it.

Could state courts really disregard the Supreme Court’s directives in such an open fashion? Doesn’t the law require them to follow the Supreme Court’s holdings? Probably not. Constitutional scholars debate whether the coordinate branches of the federal government are required to abide by the Supreme Court’s holdings. Everyone agrees that the Supreme Court has the power to issue binding judgments in cases, including those involving federal officers. But judgments formally bind only the parties before the court. It remains an unresolved question whether, for example, the executive branch may implement its own interpretation of the law when operating outside the scope of a formal judgment against it.

If there is legitimate doubt that the coordinate branches of the federal government must follow Supreme Court holdings, there is less reason to think state judiciaries must do so. While state courts may be popularly regarded as lower courts, they are not “inferior courts” in the constitutional sense. Inferior courts are those created by Congress and vested with the “judicial Power of the United States.” State courts, by contrast, predate the Constitution and wield the judicial power of fifty sovereign states. The Supreme Court merely has appellate review over some state court decisions, and that is only because Congress has passed a statute making it so.

Even if the state courts formally retain the right to defy Supreme Court holdings, maybe norms of adjudication prevent them from doing so. This, too, is unlikely. Even some federal courts—true “inferior courts”—openly challenge the Supreme Court’s interpretations of federal law, judicial norms notwithstanding.

---

530 See Baude, supra note 285, at 1809–10; Walsh, supra note 529, at 1721.
531 See Walsh, supra note 529, at 1715.
532 See id. at 1721; see also Baude, supra note 285, at 1809–10.
533 See U.S. CONST. art. III, § 1.
534 Id.
535 See Arnold, supra note 357, at 1398.
537 See infra notes 538–40 and accompanying text.
is notorious for this practice. It regularly performs intellectual contortions to avoid conforming to the Supreme Court’s holdings. And Judge Stephen Reinhardt of the Ninth Circuit has said that the Supreme Court “can’t catch . . . all” of his court’s disobedient rulings. These federal judges are constrained by the possibility of Supreme Court review and reversal. They are thus well served by couching their nonconforming decisions in conformist language. But without ASARCO, state courts would have many opportunities to stray without the threat of reversal. In such cases, they would have no such conformist incentive and could disobey more openly than any federal judge.

This is the primary policy effect of the ASARCO rule. It functions to ensure that the federal judiciary, not those of the states, has the final say in all cases initiated under federal law. In doing so, it heads off the possibility that a state judiciary could strike off on its own, contorting federal law to serve its own preferences.

2. The ASARCO Rule Promotes the Uniformity of Federal Law

Assume now, as the Supreme Court regularly does, that the state courts are competent, impartial adjudicators of federal questions. Then there is no concern that states might systematically misinterpret federal law. What else is there to fear in a world where state courts are the final arbiters of some federal claims? Fragmentation. Recall that there may be no one with standing to raise certain questions about, for example, the Establishment Clause, the Equal Protection Clause, the Statement and Account Clause, or the Incompatibility Clause in federal court. Those questions could, however, be raised in some state courts, and, without ASARCO, each state’s highest court would be a terminal point of review. The United States has fifty state judiciaries, and a significant minority of those have lax standing requirements.

---

543 See id.
544 See, e.g., Sawyer v. Smith, 497 U.S. 227, 241 (1990) (“State courts are coequal parts of our national judicial system and give serious attention to their responsibilities for enforcing the commands of the Constitution.”).
545 See id.
546 See discussion supra notes 26–30 and accompanying text.
547 See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 617–18, 623–24; see also id. at 634–36 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
548 See discussion supra Section I.B.
Without ASARCO, such states might via competent, good-faith interpretation, come to different results.\footnote{See discussion supra Section I.B.} The Supreme Court of Ohio might, for example, disagree with the Supreme Court of Michigan regarding the contours of the Establishment Clause.
Such disagreement would create the equivalent of a circuit split among state rather than federal courts. But without ASARCO’s path to Supreme Court review, the split might persist indefinitely.\footnote{See ASARCO, 490 U.S. at 617–18, 623–24; see also id. at 634–36 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).}

Uniformity in federal law matters. Uniformity reduces forum shopping and allowing parties to confidently conform their activities to a known interpretation of the law.\footnote{See Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 74–78 (1938).} Without uniformity in federal law, parties can find themselves subject to one legal rule, should a plaintiff sue in one jurisdiction, and another, should it sue elsewhere.\footnote{See id.} Depending on the conflicting rules, parties may be put in an impossible position wherein any course of action risks liability.\footnote{See id.} Even barring such worst-case scenarios, fragmented law increases compliance costs by effectively transforming a single federal law into multiple rules varying across jurisdictions.\footnote{See supra note 549 and accompanying text.}

Perhaps for these reasons, ensuring unity in the interpretation of federal law is one of the Supreme Court’s primary jobs.\footnote{See Wright v. North Carolina, 415 U.S. 936, 936–37 (1974) (Douglas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari).} The Rules of the Supreme Court of the United States lists factors that the Court considers when deciding whether to grant certiorari.\footnote{See U.S. SUP. CT. R. 10.} Every factor mentions conflict—between federal circuit courts, federal circuit courts and state courts, or any court and the Supreme Court.\footnote{See id.} Indeed, one of the reasons Congress made the Supreme Court’s jurisdiction mostly discretionary was to allow it to focus on resolving splits in the lower courts.\footnote{See Wright, 415 U.S. at 937 (Douglas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari).}
The ASARCO rule helps the Supreme Court to perform its unifying role.\footnote{See supra notes 545–57 and accompanying text.} It does so in a narrow range of cases, but many of those cases bear on important constitutional questions.\footnote{See supra notes 546–50 and accompanying text.}

C. What Could Congress Do?

ASARCO has its problems, both legal and normative. But so would the world in which ASARCO came out the other way. In any case, ASARCO is the law, as determined by the Supreme Court.\footnote{See ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 623–25 (1989).} We suggested above that the Court may have overlooked the surprising consequence of ASARCO—that it opens a lane for an end run around Article III’s standing requirement.\(^{562}\) If the Court determined that ASARCO was wrong, it could simply overturn its previous decision.\(^{563}\) It is uncontroversial that the Supreme Court can correct what it deems past mistakes.\(^{564}\)

In this section, we ask who else could modify the holding of ASARCO. Specifically, we ask how much power Congress has in this area. First, we investigate whether Congress has the power to decide between the two worlds we describe above—\(565\)—the world of ASARCO and the world in which ASARCO came out the other way. It matters whether Congress has this power because, even if one thinks ASARCO wrongly decided, there are reasons to doubt that the Court would overturn the decision.\(^{566}\)

1. Could Congress Overturn ASARCO?

As discussed above,\(^{567}\) jurisdiction hawks may believe that ASARCO was wrongly decided. They have good reason to think so, given the body of Supreme Court case law on standing and the dissent in ASARCO itself.\(^{568}\) Such individuals might accept the trade-off involved in overturning ASARCO—preferring sound Article III jurisprudence at the cost of empowering state courts to shape federal law free from federal review. But it is unlikely that the Supreme Court will ever agree with such individuals and overturn ASARCO. Practically speaking, ASARCO is a power grab by the Court. For plaintiffs without federal standing, it shifts the final say on questions of federal law from the state courts to the Supreme Court.\(^{569}\) The Justices have a history of seizing power from lower courts and state courts, and once power is seized, it is rarely returned.\(^{570}\)

If not to the Supreme Court, where might jurisdiction hawks look to overturn ASARCO? Perhaps Congress.\(^{571}\) The question here is whether Congress has the power \(^{562}\) See discussion supra Part II.

\(^{563}\) See, e.g., W. Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 386, 388, 400 (1937) (overruling Adkins v. Children’s Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923), and abrogating Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)).
\(^{564}\) See id.
\(^{565}\) See discussion supra Section IV.B.
\(^{566}\) See discussion infra Section IV.C.1.
\(^{567}\) See supra notes 504–05 and accompanying text.
\(^{569}\) See id. at 618, 623–24 (majority opinion).
\(^{570}\) See, e.g., Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288, 300 (1989) (requiring lower courts to determine whether a rule applies retroactively on collateral review before addressing the merits, thereby depriving lower courts of authority to innovate in the area of constitutional criminal procedure); Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1042 (1983) (establishing a presumption that state courts decided a case on federal grounds when the case presents both federal and state grounds for decision, thereby preserving the Court’s jurisdiction).
\(^{571}\) For purposes of this subsection, we use the term “overturn” narrowly. We are interested here in whether Congress could pass a law implementing the same rule that the ASARCO to institute the rule that would exist if the Supreme Court overturned \textit{ASARCO}. Could Congress legislate a rule under which the Supreme Court never has jurisdiction to review a ruling in a state-court case brought by a no-standing plaintiff?

It could. Article III sets out the maximal scope of the Supreme Court’s jurisdiction.\footnote{See U.S. CONS. art. III.} It specifically enumerates the Court’s original jurisdiction and appends a broad swath of appellate jurisdiction.\footnote{See id. ñ 2.} But under Article III, ñ 2, the Supreme Court’s appellate jurisdiction is subject to “such Exceptions . . . as the Congress shall make.”\footnote{Id.} Congress can constrain the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court at will.\footnote{See id.} The Supreme Court endorsed this power in \textit{Ex parte McCardle},\footnote{74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1869).} holding that Congress could strip it of appellate jurisdiction in statutory habeas cases.\footnote{See id. at 513–14.} Congress could similarly pass legislation stripping the Supreme Court’s appellate jurisdiction in any case where the plaintiff lacked Article III standing.\footnote{See U.S. CONS. art. III, ñ 2.} The effect of such a law would be identical to that of a Supreme Court decision overruling \textit{ASARCO}.

2. Could Congress Fashion a Third Way?

It is not clear from a normative or a legal perspective whether one should prefer our actual legal world or one in which \textit{ASARCO} was overturned. Our actual world allows plaintiffs without Article III standing to enforce federal laws in federal court.\footnote{See \textit{ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish}, 490 U.S. 605, 618, 623–24 (1989).} But if the Supreme Court had held that there was no standing in \textit{ASARCO}, state courts would be free to fashion their own versions of federal statutory and constitutional law.\footnote{See id. at 636–37 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).} They could even do so in defiance of the U.S. Supreme Court.\footnote{See discussion supra Part II.} Presented with these two alternatives, one might seek a third.

The rock-and-a-hard-place nature of the two choices here follows from the Federal–State Standing Gap. If federal and state courts shared standing requirements, no one could bring a no-standing suit in a state court, win, and then get Supreme Court review (the problem with the \textit{ASARCO} rule).\footnote{See \textit{ASARCO}, 490 U.S. at 617–18.} Nor could state courts decide important cases involving federal law that would be shielded from federal review (the problem without the \textit{ASARCO} rule).\footnote{See id. at 636–37 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).} To fashion a third way, then, Congress would need to eliminate the Federal–State Standing Gap.
How could Congress perform such a feat? It could strip state courts of some of their jurisdiction to hear cases arising under federal law. It is uncontroversial that Congress has the power to establish exclusive jurisdiction in the federal courts over certain categories of cases.\(^{584}\) Under current law, state courts have no jurisdiction to hear bankruptcy, antitrust, patent, and copyright cases, among others.\(^{585}\)

If Congress can establish exclusive federal jurisdiction over particular areas of law, it could also strip state courts’ jurisdiction in cases without Article III standing. Establishing exclusive federal jurisdiction just is stripping the state courts of jurisdiction in a class of cases. The federal courts presumptively have jurisdiction to hear all cases “arising under [the] Constitution [and] the Laws of the United States.”\(^{586}\) And unless Congress says otherwise, the default rule is that states have concurrent jurisdiction over the same.\(^{587}\) So when Congress establishes exclusive jurisdiction in federal court over, say, patent cases, it is merely stripping the state courts of their presumptive jurisdiction.\(^{588}\) We propose that nothing is to stop Congress from enacting a law that, instead of stripping state court jurisdiction based on the content of cases, strips it based on the traditional elements of federal plaintiffs’ standing.\(^{589}\) It could therefore enact legislation barring state courts from hearing cases arising under federal law unless the traditional elements of Article III standing were present.

If Congress were to strip state courts of jurisdiction in cases where no plaintiff had Article III standing, the Scylla and Charybdis of ASARCO and its negation would dissolve. Under such a regime, standing would remain an absolute requirement for litigation in all federal courts, including the Supreme Court. The method we’ve described for enforcing federal law in federal court without Article III standing would no longer work. If one were to attempt to bring one’s no-standing case in state court, the state court would be obliged to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. Since federal courts have always been obliged to do the same,\(^{590}\) the litigation would end there. Such a law would patch the Federal–State Standing Gap. This would be bad news for CREW, as it would once again have to contend with standing doctrine in its Emoluments Clause suit against Trump. It would also be bad news for litigants who wish to enforce otherwise unenforceable constitutional doctrines.

\(^{586}\) U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2.

\(^{588}\) See id. (explaining that Congress can “expressly oust[ ] state courts of jurisdiction”).

\(^{589}\) Cf. Herbert Wechsler, Federal Jurisdiction and the Revision of the Judicial Code, 13 LAW & CONTEMP. PROBS. 216, 224–34 (1948) (arguing that the power of Congress to grant federal-question jurisdiction “should extend . . . to all cases in which Congress has authority to make the rule to govern disposition of the controversy” whether or not it exercises that authority).

\(^{590}\) See U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2.
The jurisdiction-stripping rule would also avoid the problems that a mere “overturn” of ASARCO would engender. If Congress required Article III standing in state court cases based on federal law, there could no longer be any unreviewable state-court cases interpreting federal law. The only cases in which a state court could interpret federal law would be those in which the plaintiffs had standing to sue. Even without ASARCO, such cases would be reviewable by the Supreme Court.591 Under such a regime, states could still employ their own relaxed standing requirements when interpreting their own laws. But the possibility of rogue state judiciaries reshaping federal statutory or constitutional provisions would be eliminated.

CONCLUSION

Article III standing doctrine is often a thorn in litigators’ sides. Because of it, people with a sincere interest in enforcing federal law find that they cannot. And, as with CREW, impact litigators sometimes discover that locating a plaintiff with standing to sue is more easily said than done. Until now, a lack of standing—either in a single case or across the population of potential litigants—has been assumed to be an absolute bar to judicial redress.

The time has come to challenge that assumption. As we show, the state courts are viable alternative forums in which private parties may enforce federal law. They are not subject to Article III’s standing requirement.592 They are able to issue largely the same remedies as the federal courts against—we argue—the same parties. It is even possible that state courts have more power in constitutional cases to issue damages judgments against federal officials.593 Finally, for impact litigators hoping to influence national law, the state courts offer a route to what they want most—federal Supreme Court review—even for plaintiffs without standing.594 Standing doctrine, as it turns out, should essentially never be treated as an obstacle to enforcing federal law. You, too, it turns out, can sue Donald Trump under the Emoluments Clause—or any other federal law—no standing required.

592 See discussion supra Section I.B.
593 See discussion supra Section III.A.