Building Only Option, W&M Informs ABA

WILLIAMSBURG — The crowded college president, and William & Mary has informed the American Bar Association that the only option regarding the crowded building of Marshall-Wythe School of Law is a new building. The building, which serves as the new home for the law school, is being proposed in conjunction with the proposed National Center for State Courts.

Alternatives have been discussed for a "regrouping on an interim basis" of all the law school functions into Marshall-Wythe and adjacent buildings.

Major Recommendations

Graves and Fischer noted, however, on the basis of architectural recommendations, a major renovation of both buildings would be required with the building of the new building only a lesser portion of which serves as the new home. The alternatives, which William & Mary has presented, are in conjunction with the proposed National Center for State Courts.

The President has indicated that during the interim period, while awaiting a decision of the General Assembly on whether funding for the new building will be provided, the best solution is "the present facilities," the letter said.

The conversation was in response to a letter, recommending the building of the Marshall-Wythe School of Law. The alternatives, which William & Mary has presented, are in conjunction with the proposed National Center for State Courts.

The overcrowding on the campus is, however, not the only concern. The ABA is to the college in September that accreditation of the law school was "overriding." The president has noted that the college has been thinking and investigating the possibility of alternative means of financing sources for the building.
