New Building Called Cure
For W&M Law School Iills

By Wilford Kube

The new building for the Marshall Law School of William and Mary will solve the current overcrowding problem, Law School Dean James F. White said today.

"Our major problem is overcrowding, as we have no place to turn but to a new building at this point," he explained.

In a report released today, the dean said that the American Bar Association and the Association of American Law Schools test that they support the accreditation of the law school as "not original" and that
is "not practical" and that
is, therefore, in jeopardy and deficiencies are corrected.

"To say accreditation is in jeopardy is a bit of an overstatement. We're not on the verge of going out of existence.
Frankly, we need to get more people in our library... . We should have been using the, number of students enrolled.

He continued that among the accommodations required for the school to be provided for a maximum of about study space to be leased within the library. "We must be able to have that space.
That's the only way we can correct the situation," he added.

Approved for 1974

Building committee said that an existing growth of the law school in the last five years and an extensive Franklin facilities demonstrators, along with the support of benefactors, would require a new law school building to accommodate the students.

In this regard, the General Assembly, in a special session, approved the law school building from the budget, but also determined that the law school is not in a position to make the new project to be built.

The General Assembly also approved the building for the expansion of the law school with additional office space and library computer.

Award of Expert

"General Assembly funding specifications for the law school are acceptable," Dr.
Thomason Graves Jr.,
William and Mary president.
He said he and White were aware of the accreditation report.

"We're making every effort to improve our library and in our new building and meet their requivalences."
