Plans for Legal Center at W&M Unveiled

Three-Diploged Staff Staff
WILLIAMSBURG (fn) - Final architectural plans for the new National Center for State Courts Building in the University of William and Mary were unveiled Thursday.

The new building, designed by the architects of the firm of Wright, Jones & Wittenberg, Inc., will be 100,000 square feet in size. It will consist of two main sections: a three-story, 60,000-square-foot main structure and a one-story, 40,000-square-foot annex.

The building will include a library, classrooms, administrative offices, and a small auditorium.

The main section will be located on the southwest corner of the campus, while the annex will be situated to the north.

The building will be constructed using state-of-the-art materials and will be designed to meet the highest standards of accessibility and energy efficiency.

The National Center for State Courts is a non-profit organization that provides research, training, and technical assistance to state courts.

The new building will provide a modern, state-of-the-art facility for the center's operations.

The center currently operates out of temporary space, which is located in a small, one-story building.

The new building will provide much-needed additional space and will enable the center to expand its operations.

The building will be designed to meet the needs of both the current and future generations of center staff and visitors.

The architect responsible for the project is James R. Wittenberg, a well-known Virginia architect.

The construction of the building is expected to be completed in 2024.

The new building will be a significant addition to the University of William and Mary, and it will help the center to continue its important work in improving the quality of state court systems across the country.
